E solute of the Haiducks, whom he commanded in those boats to follow after the Turks in the Lake. Who accustomed to such exployts, and not ignorant of the places and secrets of their Countrie, went aboord, and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gone past two leagues vpon the lake, but that they discouered a party of these fugitiues hid in a little island, awaiting the end of this tempest, to recouer againe that which they had forsaken. The Turks dismayed with the sight of these men, and forced by necessitie stand vpon their guard, welcommed them with certaine little faulcon shot which they brought with them in their boats, thinking to haue hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with such musick, to be moued therewith: besides that, the desire of the booty, which was by the Turks brought out of the castle into the isle, exceedingly animated them for the gaining

Whom so landing, the Turks with great courage receiued; so that betwixt them was fought a greater fight than is for so smal a number on both sides to be beleeued, only valor and not number holding the ballance of the victorie. But in the end, the chiefe of the Turkes, and he which was their gouernour in BOVLOVVENAR, slaine, the rest discouraged came to parley, yeelding themselues with their their wiues and children, and all that they had, as a prey vnto the victors. The prisoners were brought backe againe vnto the Castle, vntill the next day, that our men hauing put a good and strong garrison of foure hundred Haiduckes, and two hundred Hussars into BOVLOVVE-NAR, with their prisoners, and their bootie returned toward COMORA: where they, notwithstanding diuers reports of the assembly of the Turks garrisons for the surprising of them vpon the way, safetie arriued, with a rich bootie, and a number of wagons loaded with the spoiles of their enemies. The emperour had for his part thirteene ensignes, beside the places woon; which being nigh vnto CANISIA, much bridled the spoylings and incusions of that garrison.

But leauing these endlesse troubles of HVNGARIE for a while, let vs now again looke into TRANSILVANIA, to see what they there do. Moyses the rebel by Basta the Emperors lieutenant (as we haue before said) ouerthrowne, and disappointed of his hope, betooke himselfe vnto a strong castle of his owne, called SOLOMOSE, therein feare attending the final successe of his affaires. Basta in the meane time being as wise to make vse of his victorie, as he was valiant to obtaine the same, subdued the rest of the countrie, repressed the rebels, stopped the way of sedition, and put Moyses in dispaire of all safetie. Who seeing himselfe brought vnto such extremitie, offered to yeeld his castle vnto the Turkes, and so without farther acquainting of any man with his purpose, thrust himselfe with his wife and family, and all the rest of his substance into TEMESVVAR, a strong citie of the Turkes not far off: whom the Bassa in shew most courteously receiued, and the rather, for that he was in good hope to make a prey of the great wealth of this new-come fugitiue: who had not there long staied, but that he had persuaded the captain of GIVASGAR, a strong frontier castle there by, to deliuer the same to the Turks, and that without the priuity of the garison soldiers, for that he doubted that they would hardly be therunto drawn: who yet getting knowledge therof, put their captain in remembrance of his duty, beseeching him not to draw such an infamy both vpon himselfe and them, by committing so foule a fact. But afterwards finding him resolutely set downe for the betraying of the Castle, they suddenly layd hands on him, and struck of his head; and so with the bloud of their traiterous captain, hauing auerted the eminent danger, with great honour held the place.

Moyses now as he thought in safetie at TEMESVVAR, was yet still plotting how to trouble the state of TRANSYLVANIA, and raise new sturs therein; and to that end sent a number of spies with letters of credence vnto the principall men of that countrie, assuring them of great and sufficient aid from the great Turke, if they would but take vp armes for their libertie (as he termed it) and shew themselues in field against the Imperialls. Neither was Basta in the meane time careless of him, or negligent in his so weightie affaires; but knowing that he as a notorious rebel had yeelded his Castle vnto the Turkes, and was himselfe retyred vnto TEMESVVAR, forthwith made choice of six thousand of the best souldiers in his whole Armie, and so set forward to besiege it: whom at his arriuall the Turkes there in garrison derided, in hope to frustrate his designes. For why, they thought that their Castle seated vpon a steepe high hill, fortified with good and strong walls, enuironed with a broad and deepe ditch, and not subiect vnto batterie, could not but with much labour, great danger, and long time, bee gained out of their hands, it being impossible (as they supposed) for their enemies to make a breach, or find an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men seeing the strength of the place, and the difficultie to force it, stood at the first as men dismayed at the foot of the hill where the Castle stood; yet more discouraged with the impregnablenesse of the place, than with the valour of the defendants. But what cannot industrie and valour do? in seeking about to find some means to make shew of their courage & valor, they discouered a little sharpe steepe hill ouer against the castle, from the top whereof the castle was to be battered, and the besieged distressed: but to bring the cannon thither, and especially with horses, was impossible, by reason of the steep roughnesse of the ascent thereunto, with broken and hanging rocks, ouergrowne with trees and bushes, as if it had bin another Alps, not but with fire and vinegre to be opened: yet in fine, our men resoluing to gaine the place, did themselues that which their horses should haue done but could not, & by force of hand drew their cannon vp to the top of the hill, & hauing planted it ouer against the midst of their enemies great ordnance, began to batter the castle: which done, they day & night made their approches, fortified their forts & trenches, trenches, brought on their warlike munitions, and put all things in such order, as if they would euen by plaine force haue carried the place. But the Turkes more admiring the valorous resolution of our men, then resoluing themselues vpon their resistance, being not many in number within the place, and seeing themselues to haue to do with men of inuincible courage, laying aside both their hope and weapons, craued to come to a parley. Which granted, it was at length agreed, That they should deliuer vp the Castle, leauing behind them their great ordnance, their munition and ensignes, and so with their armes, and liues onely saued, to depart. A great and glorious conquest got with small charge, onely by resolution gained by our men without perill: those being indeed the true victories, which neither draw bloud out of the veines, nor teares out of the eyes.

This strong place so gained, contrary to the common opinion conceiued thereof, led the whole prouince as it were by the hand vnto the obeisance of the emperour: in such sort, that Basta hauing called together all the principall men of TRANSYLVANIA, declared vnto them the iustice of his cause, the right of the Emperour, with the malice and treachery of the Turks and rebels: how they might liue in assurance with the one, and become miserable with the others: That the Emperour was alwaies armed for their defence and health, desiring nothing but their welfare and preseruation; whereas their enemies to the contrary sought altogether their ruine and decay: That as they were not to expect light flames of fire out of the sea, no more they were to looke for aid from those their mortall enemies, whom they knew to haue before decreed to haue put them all to death, and to haue giuen their countrey vnto the Tartars their enemies: That this disaster had not now beene to fall vpon them, either euer haue been by them perceiued, without the aid of the Emperour; who opposing himselfe against this fire, had quenched it and put it out; preseruing them with his great charge, and sauing them euen in the middest of their greatest perils and dangers. That they should therefore remember these his so great benefites, to the intent to make him recompence according to the publique faith, which bindeth vs to the reward of good deserts: and that all the recompence that the Emperour desired, was the welfare of the estate, as concerning their owne good: insomuch, that hee desired nothing of them but their obeysance, for being bound to defend them and preserue them to his power: whereby it should come to passe, that he should be satisfied for his trauels, and they preserued from their enemies; the prince and the subiects together iointly working their mutuall health and welfare, each of them according vnto their proportion, for that this mutuall performance of duties preserued the sceptor for the good gouernment of their estate. Whereunto their answer was, That they besought him that their countrey might be relieued from the croud and cruelties of the men of war, and deliuered from the intollerable burthens of tributes, which so heauily oppressed it: that these obiects and inconueniences could not keepe them constant in their obedience; seeing that they both felt them, and receiued them from the hand of them, to whom they had yeelded their obedience, in hope to haue beene by them relieued: That the new feeling of the wound did continually renew in them the hatred, and the obiect of their harms still kept both their eies and their minds occupied vpon them who were the causes thereof; so that they could not well either looke vpon them or make reckoning of them: That therfore it would please him to ease them of their grieuances, in recompence whereof they would pay him 15000 Hungarian duckats yerely for to pay his men of war, and would farther furnish them with al prouisions necessarie; it being a thing more honorable and profitable also vnto a prince, moderately to vse his subiects means to keep his state in perpetuitie, than through couetousnes to deuoure them in one day, in their losse to vndoe himselfe for euer. This their offer was by Basta accepted, and the minds of these people by this contentment giuen them, kept in their dutifull allegeance and loyaltie vnto the Emperour.

Basta his admonitions to them of Transyluania.

The answere of the Transyluanians vnto the admonitions of Basta.

But whilst Basta thus trauelled for the quieting of TRANSILVANIA, Moyses the rebell in the meane time was for his part no lesse busied for the disturbing thereof againe; insomuch, that hauing by the appointment of the Visier Bassa receiued tenne thousand Tartars in his aid, and assisted with a great number of Turks, he with ensignes displaied, entred into TRANSILVANIA, protesting there to dye, or to be reuenged of Basta, who had before chased him out thence. And the better to effect this troublesome designe, hee now had made choice of a most fit time for the performance thereof. Basta vpon the trust he had of the publique faith which which he came to take of the Transyluanians, for their allegeance vnto the Emperor, which assured him from all stirs and tumults in that prouince, being with a small power come from CLAVDIOPOLIS in HVNGARIE, and then lying at WISCEBOVRG, vpon the confines of HVNGARIE. Which his journy, and the necessity of his presence in HVNGARIE for the defence thereof, had caused the Transyluanians to beleeue, that he should for that yeare stay in HVNG[illegible] as Generall of the Emperours armie there. Vpon which persuasion of his absence [illegible]y of them began againe to hold vp their heads, and to entertaine high conceits of new [illegible]rs, whereunto Moyses by his espials had prepared them, and now by his presence now a little incouraged: insomuch that many as wel of the nobilitie as others, ioyned themselues vnto him, and his increased armie against the Imperials.

Moyses with his power beeing come into the prouince, first forced a castle, about three leagues distant from WISCEBOVRG, and slew all the garrison therein. Which exploit incouraged him farther, ful of hope in the absence of Basta; and seeing himselfe now the absolute master of the field, which he at his pleasure without resistance forraged, robbed, and spoiled, with his men loaded with bootie, besieged WISCEBORVG, a little towne vpon the confines of HVNGARIE and TRANSILVANIA, neither by art nor by nature strong, but exposed as a prey vnto him that is in the field strongest, if succours be not at hand to relieue it. Howbeit weak as it was, it held out three weeks siege, and hauing a breach made in the wals endured two assaults against all the forces of the rebell. After which the besieged thinking themselues to haue sufficiently discharged their dutie, in holding out so long, and induring of so much, and out of hope to be relieued by the weake forces of Basta, came to parley with the enemie, and their liues and goods saued, yeelded vnto him the towne, and so departed themselues to VARADIN.

Wiscebourg besieged by Moyses.

Wiscebourg yeelded to Moyses.

Now albeit that there were no great forces of the Emperours on foot in TRANSILVANIA, yet the hungrie Haiduckes for all that fayled not to follow these warres, euen amidst the great clouds of their enemies, and were euer taking of some prey or bootie from the enemie, the chiefest and almost the onely meanes whereby they liue. In which doing, as they benefited themselues (the chiefe Mot[illegible] of their aduentures) so they not a little eased the countrey, by repressing the excursions and pillages of the Turkes, whereof the countrey had indured the furie. Where, amongst other prisoners by them taken, it was their fortune to light vpon a Chiaus of the Turkes come from CONSTANTINOPLE, going toward the rebell Moyses from the great Sultan Mahomet. Who by them examined, confessed, That Moyses was a man in great grace and reputation with his Lord and Master the Graund Seignior: And that hee was sent to assure him thereof; as also of all the needfull assistance of his Prince, if hee in [illegible] faithfully and effectually serue him in TRANSILVANIA, and bring it vnder his subiection and power, as hee had promised and sworne. In which doing, he should not onely gaine the credit of a noble and faithfull seruant towards him, but should farther obtaine thereby the honour to bee the Lieutenant Generall of his armie in this Prouince; the great Sultan (as hee said) hauing meanes as easie as wordes to aduaunce his faithfull seruitours, who might draw more good fortunes in one houre out of this infinite fource of felicitie and greatnesse, than they could in a thousand yeares out of the pouertie of the Princes of EVROPE. Hee sayd also, That the Great Sultan had on foot an armie of a hundred and fiftie thousand men strong, for the conquest of PESTH, and STRIGONIVM, furnished with all things necessarie, which had now alreadie turned head toward HVNGARIE, had it not been for the rebellion of some of his disloyall subiects, whom for all that hee would in short time chastise, and so turne his whole forces vpon the Emperour.

Moyses in great fauour with Mahomet.

A General besieged, looseth his reputation.

Moyses proud of his late conquest, and hauing found a great deale of great Ordnance in WISCEBOVRG, resolued to prosecute his victorie, and to besiege Basta in SOMOSINNAR, whereinto he had thrust himselfe, with the rest of his small forces; But Basta better acquainted with martial affaires than hee, and knowing that a generall departed from his charge, and brought to the mercie of a wall for his chiefe defence, hath lost his credit and reputation with his friends, and they also in hope of safetie from him thought it best first to take order for the strengthening of the [illegible]ce, so to put Moyses out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterward as he might to prouide for the safetie of himselfe and his.

Where-

A Wherefore he in good time aduertised the Gouernour of CASSOVA (who was neerest vnto him) of Moyses his designes, and of the necessitie wherewith he was himselfe enclosed. Who forthwith conceiuing the consequence of so great an exploit, as concerned both the losse of the place, and of so great a commander as was Basta, a losse irreparable; presently commanded six companies of horsemen to thrust themselues into the place, for the better defence thereof. These horsemen either afraid of the rebels armie, or else fauouring his proceedings, without respect of that they had in charge, or of their honour (things deerer vnto men of worth than their liues) without any attempt at all giuen returned again to CASSOVA; hauing with their pilfering and outrages by the way much offended and prouoked the minds of the countrey people by him spoiled. But being now better aduised, and repenting themselues
B of their faults, and crauing pardon of their Gouernour, who was about with the rest of his power to haue cut them in pieces, they offered him for satisfaction, six of the principall authors of their disloyaltie; who were all forthwith executed, and their quarters (to the terrour of others) hanged vp vpon Gibbets by the high waies side. But Basta by their trechery lay in the meane time without succour, forsaken by his friends, and the place wherin he lay, in danger to be taken: when the Transyluanians dwelling neere thereby resolued to relieue him as well for feare of the Turks bondage, as for the tyrannie of Moyses; one of whose Secretaries with letters of credence then threatened all the countrey with fire and sword, and al kind of miseries, if the inhabitants helped not with all their power to force the place and to win it. Which threats by Moises published before he had any absolute power, dismaied euery man:
C for why, they could not hope for any moderation or kindnes in the prosperitie of him, who in the time of his aduersitie gaue such apparent testimonies of his crueltie. So that the people, doubting this angrie man, resolued to preuent his so grieuous threats by relieuing of Basta, who onely was able to stop him. Amongst others, Radul Vayuod of VALACHIA mindful of the aid that Basta had giuen him against the Tartars, and willing now as a friend to reach his hand in time of his so hard distresse, immediatly rayseda power of eight thousand Valachians, which he presently sent to the reliefe of Basta. Moyses aduertised of their comming, and farther vnderstanding that Basta hauing well fortified the place, was departed thence, hauing before his departure assuredly promised his men there lett to relieue them, and that hee was now in the midst of the field gathering together his armie, changed both his resolution
D and purpose, of himselfe raised his siege, and so departed. After which, mishaps began to fall vpon him by heaps. The Turks forthwith forsooke him, taking their way to TEMESVVAR, whither they were by the Bassa called backe, to represse the Haiducks, who were now euery day euen at the gates of the citie. These actiue and couragious men for their profit attending vpon al occasions, knowing that the better part of the garrison of TEMESVVAR, was gone to aid Moyses, vpon the sudden had desperatly assailed the suburbs of that strong citie slain, all that they found there, rifled them & burnt them: & so loaded with a great & rich prey both of cattel and other things, returned to VERADIN, no man pursuing of them: And not so contented were euery day abroad seeking after new bootie; which was the cause that the Bassa now called backe the Turks from Moyses home againe into their garrisons.

The Vayuod of Valachia sendeth aid to the relicfe of Basta.

Moyses raiseth his siege.

The Bassa of Temeswar calleth home his Turkes out of Transiluania, for the repressing of the Haiducks.

E Moyses notwithstanding this departure of the garrison Turks of TEMESVVAR, was yet master of the field, Basta with his small forces not daring to oppose himselfe against him, yet by far too strong for him, the succours from the Vayuod of VALACHIA beeing not yet come which he daily expected, howbeit that many hot skirmishes passed betweene the straglingF soldiers on both sides, as they by chance met together roaming abroad in the countrey seeking after bootie. Moyses therefore seeing not any sufficient enemie to appeare in field able to stay him, laid siege to CLAVDINOPLE, a great but weak citie, and not very wel manned; for that it was thought a place fitter by the weakenesse thereof to weaken and destroy such as should vndertake the defence thereof, than sufficient to be maintained by their valour. Nenertheless, the garrison souldiers and the inhabitants (more to make a shew of their fidelity and allegeance toward the Emperor, than for any hope they had to maintain the place) standing vpon their guard & defence, Moyses was constrained to plant his great ordnance against it, and to batter it, which he did, and in a very short time with the fury of the cannon had beaten down the bulwarkes and flankers thereof, and made a faire breach in the wall, ready now to haue giuen thereunto an assault, and to haue entred. Whereupon the besieged not ignorant, their armes and baggage to bee in ſafetie brought ouer the mountaines into ſome place of ſwer, was much mooued againſt the great Sultan, complained in his ſoule, that having rui-nated his faith, his honor, & the welfare of his country, to aſſure him of his fidelitie towards him, hee yet doubted of his conſtancie, as if all theſe crimes did not bind him to ſerue him with his perſon for euer, were it euen but for feare of puniſhment from them whom hee had ſo grieuouſly offended.

In the meane time the ſuccours ſent from the Vayuod of VALACHIA were vpon the borders of TRANSYLVANIA vnder the conduct of Marſa the Vayuod his lieutenant, and Baſta was gathering together his forces, to recouer again his former ſtate; expecting euerie houre the comming of two thouſand horſemen out of SILECIA, with which vnited power hee K was in good hope to diſcomfit the rebel, & to recouer his former loſſes. Al which, Moſyes by his eſpials right well knew, and for the remedy thereof reſolued to march with thirtie thouſand men to meet with the Valachians, and to cut them off, before they could come far into TRANSYLVANIA, or ioine their forces with Baſta. For the furthering of which his purpoſe he had learned the place wherby they were to enter, their number, & the way they were to hold, the better to conduct his armie againſt them; and beeing in number more than three to one, alreadie aſſured himſelfe of the Victorie. All which fell out according to his deſire: for the Valachians comming on, being in number but eight thouſand, fell as it were a prey into his mouth. For needs fight they muſt, or die therefore, although the number were vne-quall; for that to flie was more dangerous to the Valachians (hauing the Turkes & Tartarian L libertie to haue fled: yet for al that the greater number at length preuailed againſt the leſſe; ſo that after a great and mortall fight, wherin a great number of the Turkes and Tartars were ſlaine, the Valachians in the end were enforced to leaue their dead companions, their honor, and their tents, with all their baggage in the field, and to betake themſelues to flight; but not all in rout as freſh-water ſouldiers, but with often making ſtands, as men diſdayning by true valour, but onely with number oppreſſed, to bee ouercome. The rebels proud of their victorie, and now fearing no more harme, forthwith gaue themſelues to the rifling of the enemies campe, diuided the ſpoyle, and filling the heauens with the noyſe of their M trumpets, publiſhing thereby the trophies of their victorie. Which diſorder the Valachians perceiuing, and thereof conceiuing hope of ſome good to bee done, turned head, and ferred cloſe together, cuoragiouſly thruſt themſelues into the midſt of theſe proud and trymie and be gone.

Countie Solmes ſurpriſing Wiſcenbourg, is himſelfe taken priſoner.

Whileſt this was in doing, the Countie Solmes lying in garriſon at CAROLSTAD, tooke vpon him to ſurpriſe WISCENBOVRG, and ſetting forth but with foure hundred ſol-diers of his garriſon, with wonderfull diligence ſurpriſed the place, and without any great reſiſtance resistance became masters therof. But the citizens ouer-grieued with the insolent outrages C of these men of war, opened the gates of their town vnto the rebels of TRANSILVANIA, euen then fled from the late ouerthrow: who full of reuenge, took the place, and beeing too strong for the Countie & his soldiers, made such slaughter of them in the streets (they of the town out of their windows, and from the tops of their houses helping them) that of al those which the Countie brought with him, there were but 60 left aliue; who all taken, were together with the Countie thrust into a strong and loathsome prison.

Now the bruit of the comming of the Turks great army into HVNGARIE had awaked the Christian forces to assemble themselues together, and to do their indeuour to withstand the same; so that a number of companies were raised in GERMANIE, who came into HVNGARY marching towards STRIGONVM, where the army was to be assembled. The good successe H of things past, the opinion men had of the Turks troubles with his rebels, and the great promises of the emperor, drew many into these lists of honor; in such sort, that there were come A great army of the christians. together an army of fiue and twenty thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse; all good and braue companies, well appointed and well conducted. Of this braue and gallant armie the Lord Russworm was for this yeare appointed Generall; who therewith marched within the sight of STRIGONIVM, to assure the inhabitants of reliefe, if the enemie should chance to besiege them, as the newes then went. About three weeks this armie lay there by encamped, attending the comming of the rest of the forces, which were to strengthen and make vp the same; during which time the Generall disposed of all things necessarie for the keeping of STRIGONIVM, and put into the fort of S. Andrew neere vnto it three thousand Lansquenets I for relief of the citie: which done, he remooued with his armie toward PESTH, & encamped within a league therof toward the west, resolued so to crosse the designes of the enemie if he should attempt to besiege this place (as it was doubted he would) & in hope that the preseruation thereof might in time be a cause for the winning of BVDA, and a mean to impeach the enemies forces.

The Turks army of 100000 men in field. The Turks army within a few daies after vpon a contrary designe conducted for the winning of PESTH (& resolued to raise the Christians campe) in number an hundred thousand men, came, & face to face incamped within the sight of the Christian army on the other side of the riuer Danubius. In the meane time whilest they so lay, certaine cowardly soldiers, of PESTH, more in loue with their bellies than with their honour, by stealth fled out of their K garrison in PESTH to the Turks [illegible] against them in BVDA, shamefully crauing of them vi-
The shameful flight of certain of the garrison soldiers of Pesth vnto the Turks at Buda. ctuals; whom the Turks being themselues almost in as great want, yet bounteously relieued.
Besides that, the Bassa of BVDA to corrupt the rest of their fellows, caused these renegate fugitiues to be entertained with double pay: who therefore gaue the Bassa a thousand thanks, extolling his bountie vnto the heauens, & from the walls inuited their companions to do as they had done, and so to become partakers of such bountie and pleasure as they were. Howbeit these fugitiues nothing profited the Bassa, either by their persuasion or example: for albeit that they from the mouth of the Bassa promised vnto their companions plentie of victuals, good entertainment, & foure months pay more, yet was there not any of them which hearkened or gaue eare vnto their allurements: but rather the more to assure their comman- L ders of their fidelitie, of themselues offred to be sworn again vnto their allegeance vnto the Emperour, and to dy in the place rather than to forsake it. Yet was the want of victuals then in PESTH great, and the garrison therewith extreamely pinched, fed almost as much with Pesth victualled hope, as with that little which was left them. Neither was it long after, but that according to their desires the 15 of May a great ship arriued there, laded with wine and victuals sufficient for the relief of their present necessities. Of the comming of which ship, the Turke hauing heard, attended the passage therof in the Isle, to haue intercepted it. Of which their purpose the garrison soldiers of PESTH hauing knowledge, & armed with necessitie, sallied out vpon them, and killing a number of them, inforced the rest to quit the place. This ship was but the forerunner of greater succors, for shortly after followd a number of other ships: M which arriuing at PESTH, laden with victuals and other necessaries, filled the place with as great plentie, as there had been before want. Which supply was conducted vnto PESTH by 500 harquebusiers of STRIGONIVM, the Turks from BVDA looking on, but not daring or not able to stay the same.

The suburbs of Alba Regalis by the Christians sacked and burnt.

A It fortuned at the selfesame time, that a Captaine of the Turks fled from Alba-Regalis to Rab, shewed vnto the Christians there the way and the meane how they might come to the suburbs of Alba-Regalis, and take the spoile of the same; yea and happily, as things might fall out, finde occasion to surprise the towne it selfe also; offering himselfe to be the guide in the same action. And albeit that this Turke was an enemy to be feared and distrusted, yet the Christian souldiers as men desirous both of honor and of prey, and induced also with the probability of the attempt, giue credit vnto him, and embraced the same. Neither failed he of his promise, neither the Christians of their deuoire in performance of the exploit. For the two garrisons of Rab and Strigonium assembled together, by the leading of this Turke surprised the suburbs of Alba-Regalis, slew all them that made resistance, rifled them on all hands, set them
B on fire, and so laded with riches and spoile, returned home againe in safetie.

Another conuoy of victuals by land put into Pesth.

At the same time also the Christians on the other side Danubius gathered an head together to conduct another conuoy of victuals into Pesth, with a resolution to march with the same through the plaine field at noone time of the day, euen in the eye of the enemie, so to braue him. And to this purpose the Lo. Nadasti was there present with a good number of Hungarians, Colonell Mesbourg with a Regiment of Almaines, and the Countie Thurn with a number of Hussars, all good souldiers and men of courage, desirous to haue made proofe thereof vpon their enemies. This conuoy, with the trumpets gallantly sounding, brauely marched ouer the plaine at mid day, the Turks from the wals of Buda beholding the same, but not daring to aduenture vpon it. And so Pesth for want of victuals before distressed, was now both by water C and by land plentifully relieued.

The castle of Adom vpon a vain feare forsaken by the Haiducks, who had the keeping thereof.

The Christians the last yeare hauing left the siege of Buda for the reasons before written, in their returne tooke the Castle of Adom, seated vpon the banke of Danubius, about two leagues from Buda, and for the keeping thereof, left therein a garrison of Haiducks. This Castle was commodious for the annoying of the Turks in Buda, and for the relief of the Christians in Pesth, for that it impeacheth the bringing of victuals vnto the one, and fauoured the victualling of the other. The good and faithfull defence of which place, these Haiducks vndertooke to the vttermost of their power, vpon their honor and credit, as they would be accounted valiant and couragious men: but yet refused to be bound by oath to render an account of the place, what soeuer might befall, a thing (as they truly said) aboue their forces, & more than D was in their power to performe. These men now vpon the bruit of the comming of the Turks great army afraid of their shadowes, hauing before trussed vp their baggage, set fire on the Castle, and so departed, retiring themselues to Strigonium: where examined by the Gouernour Althem of the cause of their flight, and what enemies had chased them thence, and being not able to make therefore any excuse, neither to yeeld thereof any reason more than their imagi-narie feare, were by his commandement imprisoned, there to remaine, vntill order were taken by the Generall of the armie for their further punishment.

Sultan Mahomet among his greatest pleasures perplexed

Sultan Mahomet now wallowing amidst his sensuall delights in Constantinople, yet found not therein so full contentment, but that his pleasures had also their griefes fully mixt with them. In Constantinople, the strong seat of his mightie Empire, hee was in the midst of the E insolencies and mutinies of his proud Bassaes and tumultuous Ianizaries, and abroad he was in warres both against his rebellious subiects in Asia, and the Christians in Europe. Vnto all which troubles hee saw not how to giue remedie at once, and therefore resolued (if it were possible) first to appease the troubles abroad with his rebellious subiects in Asia, as more desirous to be at peace with his owne subiects than with strangers: howbeit, that the punishing of rebellion is more necessarie in a Prince for the maintenance of his State, than is warre against a stranger for the conquering of a new Countrie or Kingdome; the one preuenting the danger hanging ouer his head, the other seruing but his vaine and ambitious desire: so hee prefer ing peace with the rebels his subiects before peace with the Christians his enemies, resolued (as I said) to pacifie the first, the more easily to ruinat the other. But whether he vpon good faith or Mahomet in vain seeketh to make peace with the rebels in Asia.
F vpon policie entered into this resolution, and whether indeed hee meant plainely with these Rebels, or but onely to deceiue them, is hard to say. Howbeit, as the sequell of the matter shewed, falshood and treacherie was the ground of all this businesse both on the one side and the other. For these men respecting only the safety and assurance of their estate, held all other actions to them indifferent, whether they were good or bad, so that they serued to that effect:

and nouriſhed with the ſame milke of Infidelitie that their Prince was, trained vp in the ſame ſchoole, and foſtered with the ſame aire, feared in him againſt them, that which they felt in themſelues againſt him. An hard matter it is to aſſure minds fraught with like craft, ſubtiltie, and deceit, [illegible]ſſed with like diſtruſt one of them of another. Howbeit Mahomet ſpared no kind of [illegible]g to deceiue theſe craftie and ſubtill men; offering vnto them, together with his gracious pardon, great preferments, dignities, & honours, ſo that they would but yeeld to him their due obedience, lay downe their armes, and no more take vp the ſame but in his ſeruice. But theſe wily foxes knew right well, that the promiſes of faithleſſe Princes coſt them nothing but words, the honor & credit whereof they regarded nor, ſo that thereby they might attaine vnto the effect of their deſires, which they eſteemed aboue all other things: ſo that for them to truſt vnto a thing of ſo ſmal value, with him that was ſo prodigall thereof, and for the ſame ſo eaſily to yeeld vp their liues and fortunes, which they eſteemed as their only treaſure, they thought right worthily to deſerue all ſhame and miſhap that might betide them. So that they not only refuſed to lay down armes, and to yeeld their obedience vnto him, as he deſired, but euen to haue peace with him vpon any conditions whatſoeuer, ſeeing them dangerous vnto themſelues, and good onely for him their enemie.

Mahomet ſeeing his offers reiected by the rebels of Aſia, couertly ſeeketh for peace with the Chriſtians.

Mahomet finding the Rebels ſo reſolutely ſet downe, as not by any meanes but by force to be appeaſed, thought it now beſt to turne his purpoſe vnto the Chriſtians, and to offer them that which the other had refuſed, in hope that peace made with the one, ſhould be the ruine and deſtruction of the other. Vpon which point hee beeing in himſelfe reſolued, ſought now but ſome honeſt meanes, not vnbeſeeming his greatneſſe, to ioyne vnto this his proiect, I to giue him a way thereunto. For the eaſing him of which care, the French Embaſſadour, then Lieger at Conſtantinople, was verie fitly then entreating with the Viſier Baſſaes for the deliuerance of the Countie Ypolan, taken at Alba Regalis the laſt yeare, and againſt all Law of armes detained priſoner at Conſtantinople. This noble Gentleman Mahomet thought fit as well for the ſufficiencie of himſelfe as with inſtructions to deale with the Emperor concerning an entreatie of peace to bee had. Whereupon hee commanded him to be ſet at libertie, with charge, That he ſhould both diſcreetly and faithfully deale with the Emperour concerning this matter of peace: which if hee ſhould by his induſtrie effect, to the good liking and contentment of Mahomet the great Sultan, that then hee ſhould become and remaine free, otherwiſe to returne againe into [illegible] former captiuitie and bondage; for whome the French K Embaſſadour gaue his word, and [illegible]e pledge. Vpon which barbarous conditions the Earle was forthwith deliuered, who by the Law of armes ſhould not at all haue beene detained. Beſides this plot laied for the negotiation of this peace, Achmet Baſſa to this purpoſe writ to Collonitz, then Commander of the Emperours armie in Hungarie. But ſee the copie of the Letters themſelues.

The letters of Achmet Baſſa to Collonitz concerning a treaty of peace to be had.

To thee our friend Collonitz health and greeting. I ſuppoſe that you yet remember the propoſitions concerning peace which our Soueraigne and moſt mightie Monarch not long agoe cauſed to be opened and propounded vnto you by certaine of his Baſſaes neere vnto Strigonium, which as then remained not reſolued. But if now it ſhall ſeeme vnto you good, that wee ſhould aſſemble our ſelues together into L ſome place of aſſurance both to the one ſide and to the other, wee may againe conferre about that buſineſſe, as having on my part full power and commandement from my Prince ſo to doe; yet with charge, that before all other things Strigonium ſhould be againe deliuered vnto vs. Which being done wee may eaſily afterward determine the other difficulties, and conclude a good and wholeſome peace. God which raigneth alone in the heauens aboue is witneſſe of our faithfull and iuſt deſire, to aſſure a quiet and firme peace betwixt vs, and that to auert theſe floods of warre from the poore people, and to giue them ſome repoſe and reſt after ſo great troubles. This is our intent and purpoſe, which God knoweth to be void of all fraud and guile; which we now declare vnto you, in hope to vnderſtand yours alſo. But if you bee not reſolued to render to vs Strigonium before we begin to intreat of any other matter, it is not needfull for you to trouble your ſelfe to giue any anſwere to theſe our letters. But if you ſhall reſolue to the contra- M rie, to deliuer the ſame, with as much ſpeed as you can let [illegible] few words vnderſtand your reſolution, the time and the place fit for our aſſemblie and meeting, to the intent fully to determine of theſe affairs. You know alſo, that you haue beene of long time accuſtomed to pay tribute vnto our Prince: which if you ſhall continue to pay for the time to come, and diſcharge the arrerages for the time paſt, it ſhall be

A bee commodious for vs, and honourable for you, ſeeing that it is an honour vnto you to bee tributaries vnto the Grand Seignior, it hauing alwayes in times paſt beene for your good and profit. Beſides that, peace ſhall likewiſe bee entreated of with the great Cham of Tartarie, who as commanded by our moſt mightie and gracious Emperour vpon iuſt and reaſonable conditions to entertaine the ſame, and neuer more but in peaceable manner to come into Hungarie. Now if that you ſhal neglect or reiect this treatie for peace, it is certaine that you ſhall bee the authour of the miſerie and ruine of the whole countrie, it beeing impoſſible that the townes and villages conſumed with fire ſhould euer recouer their former beautie or felicitie. God which raigneth in heauen is there witneſſe vnto mee, and my dread Emperour vpon earth, that I ſpeake franckely with you, and without diſſimulation concerning this matter. Now on your part, let vs vnderſtand if you haue a deſire to attend vnto this treaty of peace; according to B the purport of our Letters: for if you ſhall reſolue to the contrarie, we proteſt vnto you to write no more concerning theſe affaires.

Collonitz hauing receiued theſe letters, ſent them forthwith vnto the Emperor, requeſting his Maieſtie to conſider what anſwer he would haue giuen vnto them. Whom the Emperour, deſirous of a good peace, commanded to embrace the occaſion, and by proofe to learne whether the Turkes deſire were indeed conformable to their words or not. Whereupon Collonitz taking vnto him certaine of the beſt commanders in the armie, vndertooke the buſineſſe, and entered into the treatie of peace with the Turks: wherein he found the vnreaſonableneſſe of their demands to tend ſo much vnto the hurt and diſhonour of the Emperor, as that they euen

The Emperor aduertiſed of the Turkes motion for peace, giueth order to Collonitz for the entertaining thereof.

C at the firſt entrance ſhut vp the way to al further or reaſonable conference; it being altogether impoſſible to bring to any conformitie minds ſet downe vpon reſolutions ſo far different. For the Turks (as if the Emperor would haue beene glad of peace vpon any condition) after their proud manner, vnreaſonably demanded to haue Tranſyluania, Strigonium, and Peſth reſtored vnto them; for which they offered to deliuer vnto the Emperour Agria and Caniſia, peble for pearles. So that vpon propoſitions ſo farre different, being able to conclude nothing, they departed on both ſides as they came, to trie by armes that which by talke and conference they could not agree vpon. But as all the Turkes treaties of peace with the Chriſtians are indeed but falſe ſhewes to abuſe the facilitie of the Chriſtians by, euen ſo now alſo it was knowne, that they in the meane time, whileſt this treatie of peace was in hand, gathered to-

The Turks vnreaſonable demands breake off all the treatie of peace.

D gether great ſtore both of men and munition at Belgrade, wherewith to arme a great conuoy of victuals, which they had thought during this interparley for peace to haue put into Buda. But Collonitz vnderſtanding thereof, ceaſed further to entreat of peace, which with the falſe ſhew thereof did but hurt and deceiue the Chriſtians, and betooke himſelfe againe to his arms (his and their ſafeſt and ſureſt refuge) reſoluing with the other Captains and Commanders of the armie to doe what they might for the croſſing and hindering of the Turkes in their purpoſe for the putting of victuals into Buda: whereof there was now ſuch want, that the Turkes in garriſon there hauing alreadie eaten all their horſes, and for victuals rifled the Gouernors houſe, were reſolued to abandon the citie, if they ſhould not be within ſome few daies relieued.

E Now vpon this reſolution for the keeping of the Turks from the victualling of Buda, the Chriſtians for the more aſſurance of their purpoſe, prepared therefore both by water and by land, embarking their footmen vpon the riuer, vnder the conduct of Colonell Altmeine and Sultze, the one the Gouernour of Strigonium, and the other of Peſth; whileſt that Collonitz with the horſemen ſcouring alongſt the bankes of the riuer of Danubius, tooke the charge by land. And ſo it fortuned, that vpon the 22 day of Auguſt he with his horſemen neere vnto the village of Mohatſch (famous for the death of King Lewis) fell vpon the head of the Turks armie, led by the Baſſa Murat, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Turkes, two thouſand of them being Ianizaries: who altogether lay encamped vpon an euen plaine, verie commodious for our horſemen, who let ſlip neither the time nor the opportunitie of ſo great an aduantage of-

A notable enterpriſe of Collonitz vpon the auantguard of the Turkes army.

F fered them, but forthwith charged them: where after a number of notable charges both giuen and receiued, which ſtill abated both the number and courage of the Turkes, they at laſt retired toward the bodie of their armie, and that in ſuch haſt, as that their retreat little differed from a ſpeedie flight. After whome Collonitz followed, with like heate as hee had charged them; but euill followed by his friends, who euill performed their charge, ſeeking after the the spoyle in stead of pursuing of their enemies; the Turkes perceiuing the small number G that pursued them, turned vpon them, and so began againe not onely to make strong resistance, but euen right hardly to charge them. Who so by them presled with no lesse courage than power, were now glad themselues to retire in stead of pursuing of the victorie; but yet so, as that the retreat was made without any great losse therein receiued. Howbeit, the Turkes not a little encouraged with this change of Fortune, and perceiuing themselues too strong for their enemies that charged them, came on so fast and so couragiously, as that in fine they had defeated the Christians, had not the Haiduckes out of their boats from the Riuer in good time come resolutely to their reliefe. Which cloud the Turkes perceiuing, readie to poure forth a great tempest vpon their heads, and not daring to abide the same, againe retired, leauing the Christians victors both in the first and last charge: who not content with the H retreat of the Turkes, furiously charged them, and pursued them euen vnto their great campe, and so returned, carrying backe with them both the glorie of the field, and the spoile of their enemies.

Collonitz in good time relieued by the Haiduckes.

The Turkes affaires and designes made knowne vnto the Christians by Saxar Beg, by them taken prisoner.

In this conflict the red cornet of Murat Bassa, the cognisance of his great command, was taken, with two field-pieces, seuen hundred Turkes were left dead vpon the place, and sixscore moe taken prisoners; amongst whome was Saxar Beg: who being a man of vnderstanding, and by the Christians examined, confessed, That Hassan Bassa the day before this conflict came into the campe, and there honourably dined with the great Cham: with whom after their great cheere he entring into discourse of many great matters, and among the rest, concerning his returne into his countrey; was much against the same, vntill such time as they had new victual-led Buda, whereunto he was (as hee said) both in honour and in duetie bound to giue his assi- I stance, the losse of this good place being of so great importance vnto the great Sultan. That otherwise his aid had beene to him rather hurtfull than profitable, his people hauing de-uoured so much victuals and performed nothing, if he should now at this time faile to doe his Prince seruice, who could neuer thinke either valour or fidelitie to be in him, if hee should faile in such actions as wherein his valour and fidelitie should appeare; all things hauing no other credit and reputation, but according vnto their effects. And that therefore he should re-solue to see the end of this exploit, which required euery mans helping hand for the performance thereof, considering the forces of the enemie in readinesse to hinder the same. Moreo-uer, hee assured them, that the Bassaes purpose was to new fortifie Haswar, Pax, and Kaletsch K frontier castles, and necessarie for this action, and so to goe to the siege of Pesth; and that done, to besiege Strigonium; which for all that he doubted to win this yeare, as well by reason of the approch of Winter, as for that a great part of his forces were far off, and not easily in a little time to be assembled together. That the Tarters were yet a great way from the campe, where the Bassaes of Asia and Caramania were within a few daies expected; the one of them leading with him the reconciled Rebels of Asia, and the other six thousand Ianizaries. Which his confession although it were not altogether true, yet carried it shew of some probability, as time by proofe afterward declared.

The negligence of certain Christian souldiers forgetful of diuers duties.

Some of our men were in this charge slaine also, but few in comparison of the Turks, who there lost some of their best men. It was noted, that in this conflict the souldiers of Colonell L Saltze had euill behaued themselues, refusing to pursue the enemie being in flight, whether it were for that they feared some ambush laid for them, or for that they disdained to follow the Generall Collonitz: the reasons perhaps for which their Colonell stayed them from the pursuit of the enemie, but to euill purpose: for being out of order at such time as the Turkes turning backe, renewed the fight, they had beene all slaine and cut in pieces, had not the Hai-duckes in good time (as wee said) come on to their rescue. As for Collonitz, hee most brauely bare himselfe in this conflict, so much as in him was vrging his good fortune, for the obtaining of a full victorie; sometime performing the part of a good Captaine, and sometime of a valiant souldier; sometime forcing the charge, and againe staying his men in their retreat: insomuch, that oftentimes lost amongst his enemies, and againe returning by the grace of God, M hee escaped death as it were by myracle, and from being taken prisoner, by chance. Into neither of which dangers hee could haue fallen, without the danger of the whole armie; which, next vnto God, was for the safetie thereof beholding vnto the valour of him their so braue a Leader. But God in his wisedome createth not such worthie men, but by his pro-uidence

A uidence also to preserue them: wonder it were otherwise, that euer such worthie men should returne from amongst the midst of so many desperat dangers, death as it were enuying at their liues, and their enemies for their glory chusing them out to triumph of their spoiles and ouer-throw. And without doubt, had the rest of the Christians after his example prosecuted their good fortune, and done what good souldiers should of duty haue done, their enemies had bin quite ouerthrowne, and they themselues had beene both victorious and rich; where now for lacke of good resolution, the victory was almost equall. For beside the spoiles by them gotten, they might haue carried away with them a whole yeres pay, due to the garison of Buda, which the Turks (put into a feare, and carefull onely of their liues) had left in their camp; which they afterward againe recouered, vpon the recouerie of their force and courage. This money, with B much more, was all appointed as a prey vnto the good fortune of our men, had their valor had the courage to haue gone to fetch it; but failing of their endeauour in so glorious an action, Fortune failed them also of her bountie.

A great & rich bootie lost through the negligence of the Christians.

Now at length the armie of the Christians was met together, about the fourth of September, wherein the Lord Russworm commanded as Generall: who desirous to vnderstand of the Turks affaires and designes, sent forth two of his most trusty and expert souldiers to performe that piece of seruice: who in Turkes apparell beeing got into the Turkes armie, were there eight daies vndiscouered or suspected of any. Where, after that they roaming vp and downe, had taken a full view of the Turkes armie, and in what they might discouered their designes, they returning backe, declared vnto the Generall what they had both there heard and seene:
C as, That the Turks armie was verie great, but yet not such, as that which the last yeare had besieged Pesth: That the Turkes lay encamped at large, and not close together, which caused their armie to seeme the greater, taking vp for the lodgement thereof halfe a league, bee-ing well prouided of cannon and other field pieces: That Hassan Bassa commanded therein as Generall, hauing brought with him twelue thousand Ianizaries, beside his horsemen, and the reconciled Rebels of Asia, which were dayly looked for, the leader of whome was not knowne: some thinking it to be him who had alwayes commanded them, being a most valiant man, and expert Commander; but some other deeming him to bee but one of his Captaines that had forsaken him (as indeed hee was) a right valiant man also, but not of so great experience as hee: That the great Tartar Han, come to aid the Turkes in their warres in Hun-D garie, was (to the great discontentment of Hassan Bassa the Turkes Generall) now alreadie returned towards his own countrie (with such bootie and prisoners as he had got from the poore Christians) to appease a rebellion there raised by a young Tartar Prince his Nephew, who by his Vncle the great Han, giuen in hostage vnto Sultan Mahomet, and kept at Constantinople as in prison, hauing found meanes to make an escape, and to returne into Tartarie, was about to trouble his Vncles affaires, in hope now in his absence to mount vnto the Throne of his estate: and that the Tartar beeing come to the banke of Danubius, and by the Turkes denied boats to passe ouer the Riuer in, and with many railing and opprobrious speeches by them charged for his departure as a coward, had found meanes to make a flaoting bridge of great faggots, whereby hee passed his footmen ouer the Riuer, his horsemen swimming ouer the E same; and so was by great iournies returning home, boasting by the way as he went, that hee had reiected and troden vnder foot all the prayers and requests of Hassan Bassa, entreating him yet to stay a while in Hungarie for the seruice of the great Sultan his Master. Besides that, That they had seene six great vessels vpon the riuer of Danubius, with ten lesser vessels following of them, manned with three thousand souldiers well armed, and men of good sort, three hundred of them being Ianizaries, appointed to safe conduct the munition to be brought vp the riuer, and to serue for a conuoy vnto the other vessels that were to follow them with victuals, if happily the Christians should attempt to doe any thing against them. And in fine, That the Turkes army could not this yeare possibly be great, by reason of many great lets wherewith the great Sultan was this yeare troubled: which much abated both the courage and hope of F his Captains, who hanging their heads came, vnwillingly to these wars, accounting themselues happy, if they might in this expedition but take Pesth, that they might not returne so much di-shonoured, as they came danted and discouraged. With which newes the Christians were so much encouraged to encounter with the Turks, as if they had been assured to fight with men already discouraged and out of heart.

The Lord Russworm Generall of the Christian army, by his espials certainly informed of the estate of the Turkes armie.

The Turkes ouerthrowne by the garrison of Strigonium.

In the meane time the Huſſars of Strigonium, alwaies readie for fight, by good fortune going foorth, met with foure hundred Turkes ſeeking for forrage: who encountering together, at the firſt made a moſt braue and gallant fight, euerie one of them wiſhing, That their priuate ſ[illegible] might bee the beginning of their generall victorie. But the Huſſars being both more [illegible]full in that manner of skirmiſhing and ſudden encounter, and alſo of greater courage, at length brake the Turks rankes: of whome, ſix ſcore lay dead vpon the ground moſt of the reſt were taken priſoners, with an hundred and thirtie good and ſeruiceable horſes, wherewith both the glorie and the profit of their victorie was encreaſed. Colonell Sultze alſo with three hundred men marching out from the campe, chanced to diſcouer an hundred of thoſe braue horſemen which but newly came out of Aſia with Zellaly the Rebell, who hauing neuer ſeene the armie of the Chriſtians, nor yet felt of their forces, were with three hundred Ianizaries vpon a brauerie come ouer the riuer of Danubius, to take a view of the Chriſtian campe: for the drawing on of whome, the politique Colonell had ſent forth fiftie of his horſemen a great way from the reſt of his troupe, as it were to diſcouer the countrey thereabout. Theſe forerunners fayled not to meet with the Turkes, as if it had been by chance, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking to haue had a great hand ouer that ſo ſmall a number; when vpon the ſudden Sultze with the reſt of his companie comming on, and hotly charging them, encouraged his owne men, and diſcouraged the Turkes: who ſurpriſed with feare, thinking the Chriſtians to bee more in number than indeed they were, hauing left ſome fiftie of their men dead vpon the place, as men diſmayed and void of vnderſtanding, fled. In which flight, ſuch as were not by the Chriſtians ſlaine, were in the riuer of Danubius drowned, whereinto they for feare all headlong plunged themſelues.

The Turkes defeated by Colonel Sultze.

The General of the Chriſtian army prouidetly fortifieth vpon the riuer of Danubius.

All theſe little conflicts ſerued but as ſparkes to kindle the great fire by the Baſſa entended; his firſt purpoſe beeing to put a conuoy of v[illegible]als into Buda, which the Chriſtians thought by all meanes to hinder; which ſo co[illegible]ntentions were not but by force and policie to be decided. The Chriſtian Generall wiſely doubting leſt the Baſſa ſhould come and lodge his armie betwixt Vicegrade and Buda, and ſo victuall the citie at his pleaſure, raiſed a ſtrong fort of an old Church betwixt the ſaid two places, and therein lodged a Regiment of Lanſquenets. Beſide which fort, called the fort of Saint Andrew, he built another at the head thereof in the Iſle of Vicegrade, in ſuch order and proportion, that theſe two forts might one of them defend the other, and anno[illegible]hat ſhould attempt to force either of them. Together with this commodiouſneſſe, the f[illegible]he Iſle kept the paſſage vpon Danubius free and open for the bringing of victuals and other neceſſaries to the campe of the Chriſtians; and was but a league and an halfe from Buda: into which fort was put a Regiment of foure thouſand Italians, beeing all verie well armed. Which done, he made a bridge of boats vpon the Riuer, which began in the campe, and ended at the Iſle, for the relieuing of the fort; and ſo from thence paſſed quite ouer the riuer to Vacia, a little towne, which it was needfull for the Chriſtians to keepe.

The Turkes made a bridge ouer the riuer of Danubius.

A great ambuſh laid for the intercepting of the Turkes.

Theſe forts finiſhed according to the neceſſitie of the time, it was not long after, but that the Baſſa ſent ten thouſand Turkes both horſe and foot to take the firſt of them, which they ſuppoſed to haue beene but weakely fortified. Who comming thither, were with ſuch courage receiued by the Lanſquenets with their harquebuſes, as that the whole fort ſeemed to haue beene on fire. Wherewith the Turkes diſmayed, as men in their expectation deceiued, and in approching of the ſame hauing ſome of their men ſlaine, and moe hurt, they ſounded a retreat, and hauing done nothing, but loſt a number of their men, returned to their campe from whence they came. In which enterpriſe they failing, they reſolued vpon another, and began to make a bridge ouer Danubius, in hope thereby to paſſe ouer, and to annoy the Chriſtians on the other ſide of the riuer. Whereof the Generall of the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, ſuffered them without any interruption to ſpend the time in performing of the ſame. But certainely enformed by his eſpials, both of the day and houre wherein they were about to paſſe ouer, he layed an ambuſh of foure thouſand L[illegible]anſquenets and two thouſand Reiſters for them, in ſuch place as from whence they might without danger doe great harme vnto the enemie, and aſſure the bodie of the Chriſtian armie. The riuer of Danubius had growing vpon the bankes thereof, and eſpecially in the deſolate and vnfrequented places, great ſtore of flags and and reeds; which were now thicke, and high enough to couer theſe footmen in, hauing with them foure culuerins readie charged. Behinde this ambuſh lay Colonel Collonitz with his regiment, and in the head of it the Prince Iolnuille with a certaine number of French gentlemen, who vpon a braue courage, and a deſire they had to ſee ſeruice, had followed him into thoſe wars. There was alſo the Lord of Baſſomperre another French Lord, with his own priuat followers, in number few, but in valor great. Vpon the flanks lay foure troups of Carabins French men, Loranoiſes, and Wallons, moſt expert and reſolute ſouldiers.

The Turks hauing made their bridge, began now to paſſe ouer the ſame, being charged by ſome few ſtragling and looſe forerunners of the Chriſtians, ſent before for that purpoſe: whom the Turks not much regarding, ſtill preſſed on, in hope to ouertake them, and to cut them in pieces, not aware of the ambuſh laid for them, nor of their enemies counter-deſignes. The footmen in the meane time lying ſtil cloſe in the reeds in ambuſh, beholding how and in what order they paſſed, and expecting but the time when they were to begin their charge. But hauing perceiued ten thouſand of the Turks to be now come ouer, and making head toward them; the Wallons vpon the banke of the riuer (as was before appointed) firſt diſcharged their pieces vpon them and ſlew ſome few of them. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ſtill paſſing on by them, ſlew of them alſo about foure and twentie, and ſo keeping their way, marched directly toward the Chriſtians. But this their forwardneſſe was quickely ſtayed, and their courage abated: for in paſſing by they were vpon the ſudden aſſailed by the Lanſquenets & Reiſters, now riſen out of ambuſh, and by them hardly laid vnto on euery ſide; as alſo by the horſemen, who now come in, had put them into ſome diſorder before they were well aware of them. The Wallons alſo at the firſt by the Turks ſcattered, but now againe rallied, and deſirous to reuenge the death of their friends and fellowes, now played their parts, and on another ſide right furiouſly charged their enemies. During all which fight the culuerins ceaſed not to open the flanks of the Turks battell, with the loſſe of a number of their men by the furie of them rent in pieces. Neither did Collonitz foreſlow ſo faire an opportunitie, but afront charging this diſmaled companie, by plaine force cauſed them to giue ground; the Carabins in the meane time charging them vpon their flanks, and the Wallons behinde. Who thus on euerie ſide beſet and hardly layd vnto; as men diſcouraged, and out of hope to be relieued, turned their backs and fled amaine, to haue recouered the bridge whereby they came ouer. In which fight and flight two thouſand of them being ſlaine, and the reſt not able to recouer the bridge, driuen headlong into the riuer, were therein drowned and ſlaine to the number of fiue thouſand of them, thoſe which remained aliue being all taken priſoners. Amongſt the reſt, one of the Baſſa's, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, was ſlaine, with many other Captaines and Commanders of great note, and fifteene hundred Ianizaries. There were alſo foure field pieces taken, with thirtie enſignes and two cornets, beſide a very rich prey of braue and couragious horſes, with much faire armour, rich apparel, and good ſcimiters, weapons of no ſmall account and price among the Turks. This ouerthrow much abated the courage and hope of the reſt of the Turks for comming to the effect of their deſignes; and increaſed the courage and hope of the Chriſtians, reaſonably wel hereby aſſured of the good ſucceſſe of their affaires for this yeare in Hungarie.

Sultan Mahomet much troubled in his affaires.

About this time Sultan Mahomet hauing put a Fleet of Gallies to ſea, to haue gone againſt the King of Fez, was certainly informed, how that the ſame with tempeſt ſore beaten, to auoid ſhipwrecke, was againe returned vnto the ſame port from whence it looſed, bringing backe with it nothing for all his great charges, but ſickeneſſe and great loſſes at ſea receiued. The like euill hap or worſe hauing at the ſame time alſo betided another Fleet by him ſet out into the Euxine or blacke ſea, to defend theſe ſea coaſts from being rifled and ſpoyled by the Rebels in Aſia, who with their dayly incurſions did there ſtill great harme. For albeit that Zellaly one of the Captaines of the Rebels, allured with Mahomet his faire promiſes, was by the ſtrait of the Dardanelli (called in antient time the ſtrait of Helleſpont) come with twelue thouſand good ſouldiours out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo marching through Macedonia, was come into Hungarie, there to doe his Lord and Maſter ſeruice; yet the chiefe Rebell held ſtill out, and both now and for diuers yeares after maintained a moſt cruell and dangerous warre, to the great trouble of the Graund Seigniour, and the hindering of his affaires. And euen now the craftie Rebell hauing made ſhew as if he would haue ſubmitted himſelfe, and

and come ouer into Europe as Zellaly did; and had therefore certaine gallies sent vnto him from Mahomet, to haue transported him and his souldiors in: he now of them possessed, slew all them that were sent therein, and kept the gallies to himselfe. So that so far from was it, that the rebellion was extinguished in Asia, and the Rebels suppressed, as that they were now vp in greater number than euer, and so did also more harme. Whereunto they were also the more encouraged by the example of Hassan Bassa (not him the General in Hungarie, but another Bassa of the same name) who by the Great Sultan sent against these Rebels, had for a time kept them vnder, and somewhat represſed their insolencie: but now by Mahomets displaced, and another being sent to succeed him; he therewith discontented, so animated and incensed his souldiers against him, as that comming to haue taken vpon him his charge, he found most part of the souldiers readie to turne their weapons vpon him: so that at length they fell together by the eares about the matter, some taking part with the old General, and some with the new. In which tumultuous quarrell a number of souldiers were slaine, all they of the richer sort spoiled, and the Great Sultans seruice and authoritie neglected. But the new General armed with his Princes authoritie, and some of the old souldiers also taking his part, at last preuailing, Hassan the old Generall with his partakers were glad to flie and shift for themselues: who for all that, hauing afterward gathered together the dispersed souldiers, and joining with the rest of the Rebels, held still the bodie of a good armie on foot; by his example stirring vp the people to rebellion, crossing the seruice of his Soueraign, and doing what harme he could, so to seeme vnto his followers the more valiant. The Persian King on the other side taking the aduantage of these the Turks troubles at home, as also of his wars with the Christians, at the same time with a great armie besieged the great citie of Tauris, as then kept by the Turks with a most strong garrison. In which siege he for batterie vsed the helpe of the cannon, an engine of long time by the Persians scorned, as not beseeming valiant men; vntil that by their owne harmes taught, he was now content to vse it; being with the same, as also with skilfull cannoniers furnished by the Portugals: by which means he in short time after againe recouered this great citie from the Turks, being before by Sultan Amurath taken from Mahomet the Persian King, but now againe restored vnto the Persian Kingdome.

Sultan Mahomet thus on euery side beset with troubles, and not well knowing which way to turne himselfe for to remedie the same, being in minde much troubled and perplexed, began to enter into consideration of the vanitie of these earthly things, & of the frailtie of his estate; and so strucke as it were with a remorse of conscience, and a fi[r]me beleefe that God did thus chastise and punish him for his offences, considering that his auncestors had neuer bin troubled with any such attaints or disgraces, he conuerted all his thoughts vnto prayers towards God: and therefore gaue commandement for publike prayers to be continually said in all the Mosquies or churches throughout all his dominions, giuing himself wholly also vnto such deuout exercises and works of charitie: and withall sent two of his most reuerend Priests bare headed and bare footed on pilgrimage to Mecha (where the chiefe Temple of their great Prophet is, and wherein they vainly beleeue their superstitious praiers to be of him most speedily heard) there to pray vnto him for the health and prosperitie of him their Prince and Soueraigne.

Sultan Mahomet perplexed with the euill successe of his affaires, falleth to his superstitious deuotions

At the same time, Amurat Rais an old pyrat the Turks Admiral for the West part of the Mediterranian, roaming there vp and down, and doing what harme he could, chanced to light vpon a great Flemish ship, which he with his gallies forthwith enclosed, the calmenesse of the weather then fauouring him, and hindring the Flemings, their ship being able to make no way. Who so beset, and hauing made a great fight against the whole fleet, and slain a number of the Turks, and sore rent diuers of their gallies, though not without losse of many of their own men also; being not able longer to fight, and now seeing themselues boorded by as many Turks as could well stand vpon the hatches of the ship, & their gallies hanging round about her; as men of inuincible courage, and resolued to die, and yet to sell their liues at as deere a rate as they could, laid all the pouder they had left in the ship on an heape together, & thereunto vpon the sudden put fire, by force whereof the Turks with the hatches were al blown vp, the Flemings with their ship rent in pieces, together with diuers of the gallies that were fast grapled vnto her, and an incredible harme done vnto such other of the gallies as were neere vnto her. Men worthie alwayes to vanquish, seeing that they feare nothing more than to be themselues vanquished: and more worthie to haue liued for the glorie of men, than by their crueltie to haue

A haue perished to the dishonor of men. The old pyrat astonied at so great and desperat a resolution, hauing in this exploit lost much, and gained nothing, hasted to the shore to repaire his rent gallies, and so to put to sea againe: Where he had not long beene, but that he by chance (and that full fore against his will) met with the great Duke of Florence his gallies, accounted the best gallies in the world, and such as now at this present most troubled the Turkes designes. At which meeting, after many a thundering cannon shot on both sides discharged, not without the apparant losse on the Turks behalfe, when they should haue come to haue grapled together, and to haue fought hand to hand, a thing which the Florentines most desired, as in hope to haue made that famous pyrat the prize of their victorie; he not willing so to do, suddenly turned about and fled; after whom the Florentines followed amaine, and in the chase
B sunke some of his gallies, and tooke other some full of great riches: and so brake the credit of this old and renowned Pyrat, as that for a great while after he was little by the Christians feared vpon that coast. But leauing Mahomet to his deuotions, & the old pyrat to bewaile his losses, let vs againe returne to see what the great armies of the Turks and of the Christians did more in Hungarie.

While these armies lay encamped the one attending vpon the other, many an hot skirmish passed betwixt them, most whereof forted vnto the hurt and losse of the Turks. Among others it fortuned, that a troupe of aduenturers going out of the Christian army to seeke after booty, fell vpon a like troup of the Turks, come out for the like purpose: where after a sharp encounter on both sides giuen and receiued, the Turks at length put to the worse & defeated, betook
C themselues to flight, hauing left a number of their fellowes dead vpon the place, and lost two of their ensignes, with an hundred and thirty horses of seruice. In which chase the Christians hardly pursuing them, draue a number moe of them into the Danubius, wherein they most miserably perished; and tooke a great many moe prisoners, amongst whom were found aboue fourescore Italian renegates, who brought into the camp, were as enemies vnto God, in a martiall court all condemned to be hanged, and so accordingly executed, sauing the Captain himselfe, who for the regard of his place was beheaded.

The Turkes in a skirmish by the Christians ouerthrowne.

Eighty Italian renegates hanged.

Shortly after, the great Bassa ariuing with his armie, came in the beginning of October and encamped neere Buda, both for the preseruation of the place, and the safetie of his armie, now greatly diminished both in number and courage. For it was certainely knowne by diuers fugi-
D tiues from the Turkes, that in these many conflicts they had lost a number of their best souldiers, but especially of their Ianizaries. So that the Bassa for the supplying of that defect, was glad to make choice of 6000 of his best soldiers, whom armed with muskets and scimitars, the proper armes of the Ianizaries, he entertained into the roomes and pay of the Ianizaries that were dead and slaine: the rest of his armie for the most part consisting of bare and feeble base raw souldiers. Besides this, that all the army was full of mourning and lamentation, the souldiers in all places bewailing the losse of their brethren, their friends, and companions: so that in stead of their wonted threats and brauerie, nothing was to be heard but sighing and complaining. And moreouer, that the generall opinion conceiued of the greatnesse of the Christian army (imagined to bee much greater and stronger than indeed it was) had strucke such a feare into the E mindes of the Turks, as that they were resolued, Buda being once victualled, to return home, all their other proud designes for this yeare set apart: which was the cause that they had dislodged with their army, and drawne neere vnto the city, the better to attend to the new victualling thereof, and so to be gone; accounting themselues right happie, if they might but performe that good piece of seruice and saue themselues.

The Turkes army greatly diminished and discouraged.

The Christians before in doubt lest the Turkes should haue besieged Pesth, as they had before giuen it forth they would, and seeing them now to be risen with their armie and encamped neere vnto Buda, resolued to follow them, and in what they might to crosse their designes: and thereupon leauing Pesth, as now out of danger, they rose also, and came and encamped before the fort in the Isle of Vicegrade, betwixt the said fort and Vacia; where F they stayed foure dayes, and then by a bridge which they made vpon the Danubie, whereby to passe from the Isle where the Italians lay in garrison, vnto the fort of S. Andrew, kept by the Lansquenets, they with the whole armie passed the riuer, and so came and encamped before the fort of Saint Andrew, in the face of the enemie. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two armies was plaine and open, without woods, bushes, or riuers, to hinder the ioining of of a set battell. In which so fit a place, the Christians incouraged with the feare of their ene- C mies, and the diminishing of their number and courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous rising, as by other aduertisements) were desirous in so fauourable occasions, to haue giuen them battell; and for the desire they had thereof, were come thither to seeke it: w[illegible]e Turkes on the other side sought as much to shun, not daring to aduenture themselues vnto the fortune of a generall battell, for all the bragges they had made. Ne-uertheless, very shame arming them with some resolution, they put forth into the field a battalion of fiue thousand men, fiue daies after that the Christians were encamped on that side of the Riuer. This battell of the Turkes came marching on, within halfe a quarter of a league of the Christians; which they would not haue done but vpon the confidence of a greater number following of them, hauing behinde them ten thousand men both horse and foot H layed as close as they possibly could a little out of the way. Now the Christians thinking of no other forces ready to fight, but those which appeared in their sight, sent forth twelue hundred men against these fiue thousand Turkes, to skirmish with them, vntill the whole armie were put into order, euen for a generall battell that day to haue beene fought, if the Turkes

The christians resolue to giue the Turks battell. should accept thereof; whereunto the Generall, the Colonels, Captaines, and souldiers in generall, were fully enclined, the whole armie with great cheerefulnesse marching on foot, at this loud alarme of their common desire. Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turkes beene likewise disposed for the producing of the same. But they bee the extraordinarie fauours of Fortune, when fit occasions ioyne themselues with braue resolutions, and such resolutions with meanes to effect the same. This is the let of many most no- I ble trophies, which most commonly faile, either for lacke of fit occasion, or for lacke of good resolution for the performance of them. But as most men iudge of other mens conceits by their owne inclination, so the Christians themselues, resolued to giue battell, thought the Turkes their enemies to haue beene of the same [illegible]ion: and those fiue thousand men to haue beene the head of the auantguard, follow[illegible] the whole armie, comming to draw was quite contrarie to this the Christians hope, for their purpose was onely to traine them out into their ambushes, so without danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpose they gaue sufficient testimonie, and cause of suspect; for that the skirmish hauing continued three houres, with some losse on both sides, the Turkes armie appeared not: and these fiue K thousand Turkes now in skirmish, by [illegible] and little retiring, sought so to haue drawne the Christians into the danger of their ambu[illegible] Which their manner of fight caused the Christians to suspect the matter: for it was not like, that fiue thousand men should giue ground to twelue hundred, if they had not had some secret meaning therein, which they sought to effect to their more aduantage. Which caused the Christian Carabins which followed them, not to bee too earnest in pursuing of them, and more closely to serre themselues together, the better to endure the shocke of their enemies, if they should charge them. Neither were they in that their prouident feare deceiued: for the Turkes seeing their purpose discouered, and themselues now out of hope to effect the same, vpon the sudden made a stand, and so presently comming on, hardly charged the formost of our Carabins: who as men halfe surpri- L sed, to see themselues so readily and resolutely charged, by men who but now made shew as if they would haue fled, were not able so valiantly to receiue the charge (considering the A conflict betwixt the Turkes and the Christians. great number of them by whome they were charged) but that some few of them were ouer-throwne and slaine, with some of the Hungarians amongst them. Howbeit they made good resistance, and right valiantly repulsed their enemies, of whom they slew a good number also.

The preasse in this conflict was great, euerie one desiring to shew himselfe braue and couragious in the head of his owne armie. But new supplies still comming in, the Turkes in fine shrunke backe and retired, hauing left three hundred of their fellowes dead vpon the place, accompanied with an hundred of the Christians there slaine likewise. Now vpon the retreat on both sides, euery man in his conceit appointed the next day for the generall day of battell: M the bragging speeches of the Turkes giuing the Chri[illegible]casion so to thinke; for why, they seldome or neuer refuse battell being offered them by the Christians, as wel for the confidence they commonly haue in their multitude, as for the foolish opinion they haue of the inculitable predes[illegible]ion of men to life or death: accounting it amongst them an eternall infamie,

A famie, to refuse any combat against the Christians; which howsoeuer it fall out, should fort to their aduantage, by vanquishing gaining the fruits of their victory; and by losing their liues in battell, to gaine the ioyes of heauen: being vainly perswaded, no mens soules to go more readily vnto heauen, than the soules of such as die in battell against the Christians. Such effects old superstitious opinions are able to worke in the mindes of men, euen to the desperat aduen-turing and spending of their liues. Howbeit that this effect for this time witnesseth, that these men with all these aduantages as much feared the danger as any other poore faint hearted men; and that a strong apprehension of feare is able to preuaile against all customs and persuasions, be they neuer so old, as also against all other accidents whatsoeuer. For why, the Turks B contenting themselues with their great bragges and vaine threats, came not forth according to their promise, neither could by any meanes be drawne to aduenture themselues vnto the hazard of a generall battell. The losse of their great and choicest men discouraged and deterred them from aduenturing all to the hazard of so great a perill. For (as I haue said) almost all The Turkes refuse to come to a general battell with the Christians.
their Ianizaries and most valiant souldiours were dead or slaine, and the rest, men of small spirit or courage, reserued that little which was in them, for the safegard of themselues, and not for the gaining of any notable victorie. They had also in these often conflicts lost all dles, hauing onely a little piece of tapestrie vpon their horses backes, and by the readinesse of their horses do for a long time in one sort maintaine their fight. They carry light darts made of strait and faire canes, excellently wel made, and strongly armed; and their handie weapons

C are good sables, or broad and sharpe curtleasses. These men a great while fought most valiantly in the last combats, but in fine were all slaine, except some few which cast themselues into Danubius, and were there drowned. The losse of which men much discouraged the Turks; for why, their seruice stood them in great stead in receiuing the enemies charges, and with their bodies couering of the Turks squadrons in their greatest perils and combats. Howbeit the Turks receiued not these losses without returning of some part thereof to vs againe: For Collonitz had a little before fallen into great danger of his person, and lost some of his follo- Collonitz going about to surprise the Turkes, with losse repulsed, and himself indangered.
wers in an enterprise of great moment, had the effect answered vnto the proiect thereof.
While the Turkes yet lodged in the Isle of Vicegrade, he caused eight great field pieces to be so placed, as that therewith he so much annoyed the Turks, that they were about to haue D forsaken the place. And the more to force them so to do, the second of October he embar-qued himselfe with six hundred Haiducks vpon the Danubius, and so by night with great silence landed neere vnto the enemies, thinking so vpon the sudden to haue surprised them.
Which for all that could not so secretly be done, by reason of the comming on of the day, but that the Turks were thereof aware; who thereupon with great preise issued out of their trenches, and with all their force and power charged him. Against whom he made head, rather vp-on a braue and constant resolution, than vpon any confidence he had in his owne forces, not hauing men ynow to withstand the least part of his enemies. Which his so great resolution so abated the Turks fury, as that they stood a good while in doubt to charge men so resolued. The field pieces which he had brought ouer with him into the Isle, then serued him to good pur-E pose, beating them backe with their murthering bullets, who with their number thought to haue ouerwhelmed him. Which good helpe opposed against the number of the enemies, for a time ballanced the victorie, and wrought the death of many on both sides. This manner of fight endured the space of two houres, maintained more by resolution than by strength and power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number preuailing, the Christians therewith rather oppressed than vanquished, forsaking their field pieces, disorderly retired toward their boats. After whom the Turks eagerly following, in that pursuit slew 400 of the Haiducks, the rest with much ado recouering their boats, carrying with them their General, by them hardly defended from the furie of the enemie. Which losse happened not so vnto the Christians, but that it was mingled with some losse of the Turks also, of whom the most forward and coura-F gious were in that fight slaine, as was afterwards knowne by certaine prisoners of theirs afterward taken, who made report of the losses by them there receiued. The Turks by this so desperrat & dangerous an attempt warned to preuent the like for the time to come, cast vp great trenches in the Isle alongst the banke of Danubius, therein placing certaine Ianizaries and other their best soldiers, who there lay vntil the dislodgement of the camp to go to lie before Buda.

The

The Turkes had before built a bridge of boats at Lamaſcin, which gaue them paſſage into G Stiria, where they did great harme; for the ſtrengthening whereof they had built at both ends thereof a ſtrong fort, well furniſhed both with men and munition. This bridge ſo commodious for the Turks, and hurtfull to the Chriſtians, Trautmeſtorf Gouernor of Stiria, and a great Commander in thoſe parts, with his Stirian troupes and ſome good aid brought vnto him by the Countie Serin, vndertooke to breake. Vpon which reſolution he vpon the ſudden approched one of the aforeſaid forts, and ſo right furiouſly aſſailed the ſame before they in the fort were well aware of his comming. In which doing he cauſed the greateſt noiſe and ſtirre that was poſſible to be made with trumpets, drummes, and clattering of armour, as if it had been ſome great armie employed in that action, the more to terrifie the beſieged. Which ſo great and dreadfull a noiſe, joyned vnto ſo braue an attempt, with ſo great courage begun, H ſtrucke ſuch a terror into the mindes of the Turks, that they without any great reſiſtance quitted the place, and fled ouer the bridge to the other fort. Of which forſaken fort the Chriſtians became maſters, and with all ſpeed proſecuting their good fortune, preſently drew out thereof three cannons, and therewith battered the other Fort. In which the Turks, hauing no other place of refuge to flee vnto, nor hope of ſafetie but in their laſt valour, ſo well behaued themſelues, as that the Chriſtians had much ado to force them. Howbeit a breach being made by the furie of the canon, and ſcaling ladders ſet vp, the fort was on euery ſide aſſaulted; which the Turks for the ſpace of fiue houres ſo valiantly endured, as that it was hard to ſay who ſhould preuaile or haue the better. In this aſſault were many on both ſides ſlaine; the Turkes not being to be ouercome but with the loſſe both of their liues and honour; nor the Chriſti- I ans able to retyre without loſing the fruit of that their ſo great and rich an enterpriſe: So that the aſſault was with great reſolution on both ſides maintained, the Turkes fighting for their liues, and the Chriſtians for their honour; vntill that at laſt the Turkes with much ſlaughter ouercome, the fort was by the Chriſtians taken, and moſt of the Turks therein being ſlain, and the reſt taken priſoners, both the forts were forthwith raſed, and the bridge broken, which before had ſerued for an ordinarie paſſage for the Turks to forrage and ſpoile the Chriſtian territories by. The boats whereof the bridge was made were all burnt, and ſome great ordnance therein found broken in pieces and caſt into the riuer.

At the ſame time Lugaze a place of great importance for the ſeruice of the Emperour, and ſo neere vnto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing thereabouts, but that it K might from thence be diſcouered and knowne, was by the Tranſyluanians deliuered to Baſta Generall for the Emperor in that country. From which place he ſending out certain ſcouts toward Belgrade, they brought in with them certaine priſoners; who being examined, ſaid, that Haſſan Baſſa the Turks General in Hungarie, had writ to Giaffer Baſſa the Gouernor of Temeſwar, That he ſhould only attend to the preſeruation of his owne, without attempting any thing further againſt the Chriſtians, the preſent eſtate of their affaires ſo requiring: And that hauing reuictualled Buda, his purpoſe was for this yeare to returne, in hope of ſome good peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor.

The two armies of the Turkes and the Chriſtians lay ſtill neere the one of them vnto the other, the Turkes carefull for the reuictualling of Buda, and the Chriſtians ſtill intentiue to L their doings, and deſirous in what they might to hinder and fruſtrate the ſame. Which becauſe they could no way better do than by offering of them battell; they thereupon generally reſolued, vpon a Friday being the ſeuenteenth of October, the day by them aſſigned for the battell; hauing by the ſhooting off of three great cannons giuen warning vnto the ſouldiours throughout the campe, for the preparing of themſelues firſt toward God, and then to the ſeruice of their Prince; after they had well refreſhed themſelues, in good order tooke the field, and ſo ſtood readie ranged there, either to giue or to accept of battel. Before whom the Countie Ringraue was ſent forth with his regiment, about halfe the way betwixt the two armies, to diſcouer the mouing of the enemie, and to receiue his firſt charge if occaſion ſhould ſo require. Whoſe Scouts before ſent forth, about noone diſcouered a troupe of horſemen come out of M the Turks campe, about ſome buſineſſe they had to do, but to them vnknowne: whome the Scouts ſuppoſing to haue beene the forerunners of the Turks armie, and by them almoſt ſurpriſed, haſtily retyred back again, and by their haſtie retreat put the whole armie in an alarme, which came brauely marching on, in hope now to haue come to trie the matter by true ualour

A lour, and by the fortune of a generall battell to haue made that day for euer famous by their victory and the ouerthrow of their proud enemies. And in the heat of their ſo great courage like enough as it was for them to haue performed the ſame, had the Turkes had but ſo much courage in them as to haue met them in the field, as was wel hoped they now would. But they with their former loſſes diſcouraged, and reſolued only vpon the ſafegard of themſelues, and the victualling of Buda, had no minde to enter into theſe honorable liſts, but kept themſelues cloſe within the couert of their tents and the ſtrength of their trenches. And ſo the Chriſtians with a falſe alarme moued, and hauing for the moſt part of the day in vaine expected the coming forth of their enemies, returned into their campe deceiued of their expectation.

The ſame day there was an eſpie taken, whom they which tooke him thought to haue been B a Turke, howbeit he was found to be one of their owne men; by whom they were better enformed of the cowardiſe of the Turks, of their purpoſe for the ſhunning of battel, and of their reſolution for the keeping of themſelues within the ſafegard of their trenches, and that they ſo did, as wel for the loſſes they had before receiued, as for diuers other vnlucky accidents, which cauſed them to miſdoubt ſome euill ſucceſſe in the end & winding vp of this their expedition. Neuertheleſſe, the Chriſtians not greatly truſting to theſe reports, ſtill kept their armie in readines, to giue their enemies battell vpon the leaſt occaſion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cauſe of feare, the Turkes hauing no deſire at all to come to a generall battell: ſo that in ſtead of great effects that were expected, the time paſſed but in light skirmiſhes and vaine alarmes betwixt the two armies, vntill that at length the Turks hauing by the C riuer ſufficiently ſtored the citie of Buda with victuals, the great Baſſa ſecretly by night roſe with his army, and ſo retired toward Belgrade. Which ſo baſe a retreat differed not much from a cowardly flight, being with ſuch ſilence made vnder the darke couert of the night, as that the Chriſtians had thereof no perceiuing vntill that they were quite departed and gone. This victualling of Buda and of ſome other few places of the Turks in Hungarie, was all that the great Baſſa did this yere with his great armie; whereas at his firſt comming it was giuen out, that he would therewith take both Strigonium and Peſth from the Chriſtians.

The next day the haſtie and ſudden departure of the enemie being perceiued, the Generall of the Chriſtians called together the Colonels and other great Commanders of the armie, to conſult with them, what were beſt to be done in ſo vnexpected an occurrent? Of whom, ſome D were of opinion, That it was beſt forthwith in all haſte to purſue their fearfull enemies: other-ſome for many reaſons diſſuading the ſame, and other-ſome withall propounding ſome other notable exploits to bee taken in hand. But in concluſion, the ſafeſt point was reſolued vpon, which was, not to hazard any their troupes in purſuing of their flying enemies, who were hardly to be ouertaken; but now immediatly after their departure to attempt the taking in of ſome one of their ſtrong holds: where, amongſt others that were propounded, Hatwan was thought to be the moſt neceſſarie place, being ſo ſeated, as that beſide the great harme it did to the Chriſtians thereabout, it much hindered both aduertiſements and victuals to be brought vnto Peſth. Which exploit reſolued vpon, they forthwith raſed the fort of S. Andrew, and the fort by them built in the Iſle of Vicegade, becauſe they ſhould not ſtand the Turks in any E ſtead after their departure, and ſo with all their power ſet forward toward Hatwan. This towne is ſeated beyond the riuer of Danubius toward the North, about eight leagues from Buda, croſſing the way to Tranſyluania and Caſſoua, vpon a faire and euen plaine, neere vnto a great and deepe mariſh, and was ſometime defended with good and ſtrong wals, with a caſtle, and three large and deepe ditches, for a long time in the power of the Turks, and which without loſſe a great while held out againſt the valiant Baron Teuffenbach, by whom it was moſt ſtraitly in vaine beſieged: vntill that afterward it was againe beſieged by Maximilian the Archduke, the Emperours brother, then Generall of his armie in Hungarie in the yeare 1594, vnto whom it was by compoſition ſurrendered, after it had for a certaine ſpace beene by the Turkes notably defended: who conſidering the harme this place did vnto the Emperors territories, by reaſon of the ſcituation thereof, wherein a great and ſtrong garriſon of the Turkes F alwaies lying, forraged all the Chriſtian territories as farre as the riuer Vague, yea and oftentimes tooke booties as far as Strigonium, and by ſpoiling of all that ſide of Hungarie, cauſed the countrey to pay contribution as farre as Ternauie, ſtanding within foure leagues of the mountaines which ſeperat Hungarie and Morauia: all irreparable loſſes to the Chriſtians, and hardly hardly to be auoided: for which reasons he caused it then to be dismantled, and to be made [illegible] for the wars. After which time for all that, the Turks from the common [illegible] had with great labour againe new fortified the same, with walls made with great [illegible] wood and faggots, with earth rammed in betwixt them; a [illegible] on, and better able to withstand the fury of the cannon, then are walls [illegible] the Turks vse most commonly to fortifie such places as they meane to hold, and [illegible] times cost much for the Christians to gaine the same from them.

This place thus fortified, and both with men and munition well furnished, and with all things needfull stored, was able to endure a great and long siege; whereunto the garison in was as resolutely set downe, as were the Christians to attempt it: where now, at their comming vnto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, assisted with 300 Lanspeneks, vnder the leading of Countie Sultze, and Grasold Generall of the Italians, were appointed to [illegible] rest of the armie, and to begin to make the approches: which they did by [illegible] mill, driuen by the water of the marish, not past a musket shot from the town. Where [illegible] they were busied, the Turkes sallying out of the towne, came to fight hand to hand with the Christians, and had with them a sharpe combat, the Turkes fighting for the defence of the place and of their liues, and the Christians for the gaining of the same, and for their honour. Which so contrarie a resolution in that conflict cost the liues of many; and amongst others the life of Grasold, Generall of the Italians, there slaine with a harquebuse shot, vnto the great hurt of the whole armie, but especially of the Italians, now depriued of so great and expert a Commander. At last for all that, the Turks were enforced confusedly to retire again into the towne: hauing in this sallie lost a number of their men also. The Christians neuertheless hauing driuen the Turkes backe into the towne, went forward with their businesse in making their approches, and placing their gabions to couer their cannon: wherein the Turks with their great & small shot did them great harme, but especially with their murthering-pieces, charged with nailes and other small pieces of yron. Howbeit, by the comming of the Lord Russworm with the rest of the armie, the approches were the next day brought on, and the batterie planted so neere vnto the towne, as that the Turkes could not without most manifest danger and losse, any more sally out to trouble the Christians in their workes. The first inconuenience the besieged felt, was the want of water, which through the diligence of our men was soone taken from them, the cannon right furiously battering the wals in the mean space. Wherewith the Turks discouraged, and now out of hope to be relieued, thought it not best for them to expect either whilest a breach were made, or an assault giuen, but by parly to preuent these dangers, in hope so to come to some easier composition while yet they stood in their whole strength. And so parley by the Turkes demanded, and by the Christians granted, and hostages for the suretie thereof on both sides giuen, they sent two of the chiefe men amongst them to entreat of the same: who at the first demanded, That their liues and libertie saued, they might with bag and baggage depart. Whereunto answer was giuen them, That they should onely with their liues and libertie be gone, with some few hundreds of their worst horses of courtesie giuen them, to carry them to such place as they meant to retire themselues vnto, and to deliuer into the hands of the Christians all such renegats as were in the towne.

Grasold Generall of the Italians slaine.

The Turkes in Hatwan craue parley.

Now the besieged Turkes carrying yet the markes of the crueltie by the Wallons exercised vpon them in the former siege, when as the same town was by force taken, and filled with dead bodies of all ages & sex, and doubting now this second shipwreck, with like misery threatned vnto them by the Christian Generall, if they should expect the dreadfull euent of a generall assault, accepted of these hard conditions, seeing no better could be obtained; and so couenanting, that they with their families, their liues and liberties saued, might with a safe conuoy be conducted vnto some place of surety within their own territory, they promised to giue vp the town. Which agreement on both parties resolued vpon, they ful of sorrow and heauines, with their families departing out of the town the 29 of Nouember, were by Colonel Andast with certain Hussars safely conducted to Solnoc. The Christians entring the towne, found therein great store of victuals & munition, the houses ful of corne and other necessaries, and the shops stored with weapons, shot & pouder, with 24 pieces of great ordnance ready mounted, which might haue well sufficed for the defence of the place. But all these things are but accessories vnto one principall, that is to say, to resolution, without which they are but of small force, and with-

A with which they are able to do much. Beside that, the place it selfe thus furnished well considered, seemed almost impossible to haue bin forced; but especially now that Winter was come on, which might haue brought a thousand stormes and difficulties, by the Christians not to haue been endured: so that euery man beholding the same, with his eies cast vp towards heauen, gaue God the praise, for taking away the Turks courages in their so great aduantages, and encreating of the Christians in their no lesse difficulties: vnto whom the glory, of this victory was wholly attributed, seeing that contrary to all apparance and mans forces, he had giuen to the Christians the victorie, no way able by their owne forces to haue been gained. But God, which in his prouidence from heauen beholdeth all things vpon earth, disposeth of the same as he seeth best for his glorie, and the welfare of his: so that in this action he was the only pilot B which brought this our ship into the hauen of health; for the haires of our head are of him numbred, and euen the least creatures vpon earth are by him regarded.

Into this new gained town the Christian Generall put a good and strong garrison of a thousand Lansquenets and fiue hundred Hungarians, part horsemen, and part footmen, for the keeping of the place and of the countrey thereabout: which done, he retired with his armie toward Pesth, which he relieued with victuals, and strengthened with the troupes of the Colonels Collonitz, Geisberg, and Rouer, who were there billited to passe the Winter, and to preserue the place against the deuises and enterprises of the Turks of Buda, who were still deuising and practising for the regaining thereof.

The Lord Russworm breaketh vp his army, & sendeth the ensignes gained from the Turke for a present to the Archduke Matthias.

C The time of the yeare for souldiers any longer to keep the field now past, and the great armie of the Turks risen and gone, the Lord Russworm breaking vp his armie neere vnto Strigonium, caused all the Ensignes by him this yere gained from the Turks, euen 64 in number, to be gathered together, all very braue and gallant; all which he sent with great pomp & triumph to Vienna, for a Present to the Archduke Matthias; who receiued them with great thanks giuen both vnto the Generall that sent them, and the souldiers that had gained them; and bountifully rewarding them that had brought them. They of Vienna at the same time highly commending the Generall, and not a little reioycing to see those same Ensignes now in their power within the citie, which not long before had proudly braued them in the field.

Now after the breaking vp of the Christian armie, a great number of insolent and seditious souldiers, especially of the Regiment of Colonel Altwein, roming vp and downe the country, ■ to seeke for bootie, most cruelly rifled and spoiled the countrey villages, with the inhabitants therein, as well the Christians as the Turks, sparing no more the one than the other: whose outrage not otherwise to be stayed, they were by commandement from the Emperor, by force charged ■ Widhof, and two hundred and thirty of them being brought in prisoners to Vienna, foure and thirtie of them were there for example hanged, and the rest as men not worthy of entertainment cashiered.

The souldiers of the regiment of the Reingraue euill bilsred, by extremities driuen to prouide for themselues.

The time of the yeare hauing (as we said) broken vp the armie of the Christians, the Regiment of the Countie Reingraue was put in garrison into the villages of Chiante and Temauie, alwaies at hand with the enemies, as fittest to repulse them. These souldiers were alwaies kept in doings, stil fighting whilest others were at peace, and mannaging their armes, whilest others E hanged theirs by the wals. For besides the troubles they had with the Turks, their nigh but bad neighbours, the very inhabitants of the countrey (who held all that might hurt them, for enemies, were they neuer so much their friends) oftentimes, and that for little or no occasion at all, tooke vp armes, and right furiously charged them as their mortal enemies. Of which combats there was no end, the countrey peasants still striuing to rid themselues of such ghests. So that these valiant men still enforced to buy their bread with the price of their bloud, as men become desperat, vsed the Christians as they did the Turks, diuiding all things with them by the sword. But in these small and often fights moe men were slaine & lost than would haue bin in a generall battel, some good number either on the one side or the other being euery day slain: which daily inconueniences caused these souldiers to resolue to goe to seeke their liuing elsewhere, rather than in the midst of the graues of their fellows. Whereunto they were the rather F enduced, for that but a little before, the troupe of Captaine Clinchampe, the best and brauest of the whole Regiment, was one night right furiously assailed, and almost surprised by the countrey peasants. Wherfore they departed out of Hungarie into Austria without victuals, apparel, or money, their pay due vnto them for 17 months being kept from them. A crueltie full of hardly to be auoided: for which reasons he caused his army to hasten thither, and vnfurnished of all things necessarie for the wars. After which arriuall he presently began to assault the castle of the place, and with great labour at length wan the same, with the slaughter of all the Turkes that were within it. Which victorie he obtained by meanes of certaine piles of wood and faggots, with the which he filled the ditches, and so ouerpassed the same vpon, and better to withstand the fury of the enemie, he raised vp a publique bulwarke for the Turkes behalfe. Which bulwarke afterward did them great seruice, and cost much to the Christians before they could get it from them.

Hatwan again fortified by the Turkes.

This place thus recouered, he resolued to haue the towne of Fuelbour to passe by things needful for him, without doing therein any harme: which their request he courteously granted vnto them, and accordingly their words they indeed passed, not so much as once without commandement attempting once to touch. Which their so quiet passage caused the bishop to further his purpose, whereby to passe ouer the riuer which diuideth Hungarie from Austria. Which purpose when he came vnto the peasants of Austria, they assembled themselues together in great number, and cast vp a fort vpon the banke of the riuer, with three faulcons of yron, and placed soldiers therein to keep them from comming ouer into their countrey. Which their so forwarde resolution for a while staid these men of warre: who to auoid further trouble, courteously requested passage of these men, promising all their good behauiour in passing quietly through their country: which the carles in most churlish manner refused to grant, with proud threats of the danger of their liues, if they should by force attempt the passage, and not with quietnesse returne. With which brauadoes of the countrey churles these troupes of martiall men prouoked, resolued by force to remoue these lets, and by the sword to open themselues a way: so turning the head of their bagages toward the fort, as if they would haue there passed; while the peasants stood gazing vpon them, Camgaillard with his troupe of horsemen vnperceiued of them tooke the riuer a little higher vp, and by swimming gained the farther banke: after whom captaine Clinchamp with his troupes immediatly followed also. In which passage they were much troubled with great flakes of yce, with the great deepnesse of the riuer, with the steepnesse of the bankes where they were to land, and many other difficulties: all which they regarded not, to be reuenged of their enemies. These valiant men being got ouer, vpon the sudden surprising these rude country churles, & furiously charging of them, quickly ouerthrew them, and cut them in pieces: of whom 300 were left dead vpon the place, as many moe hurt, and the rest put to flight. Which was no sooner done, but that the rest of the troups of the regiment without let passed the riuer, and so ioyned themselues vnto their victorious companions. Seuen weekes this Regiment staied in Austria; and so longer had, but that vpon the complaint and request of the nobilitie and of the people of the countrie, they hauing for 17 months pay due vnto them receiued nine months pay, were licensed to depart. Which was a great ouersight in them that had to do therewith, at once to disband so many good men, as had not their like amongst all the rest of the Emperours garrisons; and who being staid with a little money, might with their good seruice haue stood the Emperour in great stead: as by proofe afterward appeared; when as the Emperour by necessitie forced to call them together againe, could not of all that strong regiment raise but three companies; the rest being some of them returned into their owne countries, other some of them gone to serue in other places, or else otherwise dispersed. Of which three companies, the first was giuen to Camgaillard, the second to Baltazar Marades, a Spaniard, and the last to Iohn Paul an Italian: Which three Captaines had before commanded in the Reingraues regiment, and don the Emperor good seruice as they did afterward also.

The rest of this yeare ended in Hungarie, with diuers other encounters and combats, Fortune therein still fauouring the Christians. As, 300 Haiducks, going forth to seeke for bootie, by good hap chanced to meet with a companie of the Turkes being very rich, and diuers of them men of good account; amongst whom, the Gouernour of Mohatz was one: all whome these Haiducks cut in pieces, to be borne withall, for shewing no fauor vnto them, who most cruelly had before spoiled them of their parents, lands, and goods. Besides that, they tooke the Gouernour of Cinan, with his sonne, and 24 other very rich Turks, with 170 horses of seruice, and eight fat Oxen prouided for their prouision. Which fat booties drew forth other souldiers also to seeke out for the like: of whom, certain troups of the Christians going forth toward

A ward Batfrayato one of the enemies, met the Gouernor of the towne and of the territorie thereabout come out with his garrison against them; where betwixt them was made a right hot and sharpe fight: wherein at the first encounter the Turks seemed to haue the better, but in the end the Christians taking courage, ouerthrew them and cut them in pieces. In this conflict diuers prisoners were taken, with three Enfignes, and many other rich spoiles. This happy exploit was seconded with newes agreeable thereunto out of Moldauia, whereof the Vayuod by a Curror sent of purpose, gaue our men to vnderstand; which was, of the generall ouerthrow B of the Tartars: who hauing with all manner of crueltie wasted the countrey, had in the end made the inhabitants so desperat, that reposing more comfort in a speedie death (the end of all miseries) than in a lingring life, turmoiled with so many intollerable calamities, they generally arming themselues, ioyned themselues with their Vayuod, so to trie their last fortune. With which resolution they in battell encountering with the Tartars, gaue them a great ouerthrow, a number of them beeing left dead vpon the field, and the rest put to flight, and chased out of the countrey, the Moldauians notably reuenging their former losses, and in their owne territories burying their enemies.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the yeare on their parts idle, but still plotting of their great and notable designes, euen through the middest of the frost and snow to haue beene performed. The Bassa Beged hearing that the Lord Bassa lay with his troupes dispersed in the country about Lippa, in great security by reason of the extremity of the time, altogether vnfit for men to keep the field: and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, C now amidst the frost and the snow to surprize him; acquainted three other of the Turks Captaines and Commanders threabout with the matter: who liking well thereof, with 5000 men all together set forward, in hope to haue vpon the sudden surprised him. But he an old expert Captaine, and not so careless as they supposed, had his secret spies still abroad among them: by whom, he aduertised both of their purpose and of their comming, resolued in both to preuent them; and to that end hauing called together his forces, set forward to meet them in the mid way, and so before they were aware to intercept them; neither failed he of his purpose: for meeting with the Turkes fearing no such matter in place of disaduantage, and vpon the sudden charging them round, they, deceiued of their expectation for the easinesse of the victorie promised them, as men dismaied, after some smal resistance fled; aboue eleuen hundred D of them beeing in this conflict slaine, and the rest put in rout, and driuen into the riuer Maruze, there perishing; some few onely by speedie flight with the Bassa escaping. Twentie of the Turkes Captaines were heere taken, with some few other prisoners, and a great and rich bootie.

Much about the same time George Barbell, one of the chiefe of the Rebels in Transyluania, acknowledging his fault, came to Claudionople, to take the oath for his allegeance vnto the Emperour: by whose example a great number of others moued, came in and submitted themselues also: and happily he being a good and valiant Captaine, had done much more for the seruice of the Emperor, had he not bin by death preuented, for shortly after he suddenly died. The other Rebels mooued neither by his example, nor by the comming in of some others of their companions, made choice of one Bethlin Habor (a most renowned Captaine, and of great reputation amongst the souldiers) for their Chiefetaine: who proud of such a choice, immediatly after sent an Herauld vnto Bassa, to will him forthwith to deliuer vnto him all the countrie of Transyluania, as to him that was of late chosen Prince thereof, or else to denounce vnto him most cruell war: and to tell him further, That if he refused so to do, he was in good hope by his owne forces, without any aid from the Turke, to driue him out, beeing well assured of the faithful deuoire of the Transyluanians. At whose proud threats Bassa smiling, only shewed him his open hand in signe that hee accepted of his proud threates, not vouchsafing him any other answer at all. This glorious boaster bare himselfe the higher, for that he had maried the widow of Moyses the chiefe Rebell, wherby he had gained both great riches, and much credit and reputation among the common people: both which he enioyed but a while; for the fourth day after that he was married, he died, and so was buried. Bassa neuertheless, for the better assuring of the strong places of Transyluania, put into them garrisons of his most faithfull Germanes, and dispatched Crausenich away toward the Emperour, to request of him a supplie of a thousand horsemen and foure thousand foot, without which hee thought it impossible to preserue and keepe the Prouince troubled with so great factions, and so earnestly sought after by the Turkes: and further to certifie him, That the little forces he had left was not sufficient for the keeping of the places beset with so many enemies, and all lying as it were in their mouthes: That the Prouince swarmed with seditious people, one thrusting another forward in mischiefe and rebellion, as the eares of wheat driuen with the winde doe one another in the field: that the enemies were alwayes making of new incursions, which hee was not able to represse without greater forces, which he expected from his Maiesty with al speed possible: protesting, for want of such supply to bee in time sent vnto him, to lay the losse of the Prouince vpon the negligence of them which might and ought to haue sent the same; acquitting himselfe for the losse thereof, seeing that he durst not to repose any trust or confidence in the faith of the citizens and inhabitants of the townes, although they were disarmed, for hauing so often falsified their faith, and put their Prouince in danger of vtter ruine and destruction. But leauing these troubles of Transyluania and Hungarie, let vs a little step backe to see what happened among the Turkes themselues, after the departure of the great Bassa with his army out of Hungarie.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great promises made vnto his Rebels, sought to appease the rebellion in Asia, and by that meanes drawne Zellaly, one of the chiefe Rebels, with twelue thousand good souldiers out of Asia into Europe, and so into his warres in Hungarie, vpon an assured promise made vnto him of the gouernment of Bosna: the hope whereof, as it had drawne him into these late warres, so had it also encouraged him with his gallant troupes of most braue horsemen to doe the best seruice he could, so to shew himselfe worthie of so honourable a preferment: which hee right notably performed during all the time of the Bassaes abode in Hungarie, to his owne great commendation, and the furthering of his Lord and Masters seruice. But the Bassa with his weake armie retired out of Hungarie, and the Bassa himselfe returned toward Constantinople; Zellaly with three thousand horse withdrew himselfe into his promised gouernment of Bosna, to possesse himselfe thereof: and beeing come neere to Bagualue, the chiefe towne of that Prouince, hee there encamped in a faire large medow, within sight of the citie. Now Zeffer Bassa, then Gouernour of the Prouince, and not as yet thereof discharged, seeing this Rebell thus to encroach vpon his charge, as if he would euen by force intrude himselfe thereinto; with all speed called together his garrisons and men of warre (euer readie at his becke) and so went forth against Zellaly, with a purpose to haue quickely, and without any great trouble, cut him with his so small a company all in pieces. But the old Rebell not ignorant either of his owne weaknesse, or of the Bassaes strength, hauing himselfe lost the best part of his forces before in Hungarie; as he was a man of no lesse wisedome than courage, resolued now to attempt by policie that which hee well knew hee could not by force effect. Wherefore he as a great Prince, vpon some braue resolution, began to encampe himselfe as if hee had meant there to haue lyen, when as immediatly after vpon a faire night hauing caused diuers great fires to be made in his tents, as if it had been to beguile the enemie with, he suddenly rose and departed. Of whose flight (for so it was like) the Bassa vnderstanding, and that hee had forsaken his campe, hasted thither with all speed with his souldiers to take and pillage the same; not making any other account of him that was so fled and gone, but as of a base and faint-hearted coward, who for feare and want of courage had left both his campe and honour as a prey vnto his enemies; the spoyle whereof the Bassa (being possessed of the campe) gaue vnto his souldiers; who glad of such a morsell, greedily swallowed it vp, which by and by after became their bane and vtter destruction: for whilest that they were charging themselues with booties, and euery man was thinking of his prey, nothing carefull of their common safetie, Zellaly with his three thousand horse, all valiant and resolute men, suddenly the same night returning, surprised the Turks being fast on sleepe, as buried in securitie, and cut them in pieces. Some of greater courage than the rest, began to make head, and to giue some shew of their valor, but ouercome with the generall feare, out of order, and not resolued what to do, they were quickly with the rest forced, ouerthrown, and slaine. In this surprise there were of the Bassaes men six thousand found dead vpon the place: a verie great slaughter to be made by so few men. But what cannot valiant resolution do against carelesnesse, lulled asleep in the lap of securitie? The Bassa himselfe escaped by flight, with such as could get out of the campe to follow him.

Zellaly ouermacheth and slayeth.

By policy ouerthroweth Zeffer Bassa the Gouernour, and setteth it himselfe.

Now

Now Zellaly well knowing how to vse his victorie, marched in haste to all the chiefe places of the Prouince, and with his forces, more feared for their victorie than for their number, caused all the inhabitants of those places, with most part of the rest of the people of the countrey, to sweare vnto him their obedience and fidelitie. In which doing he gathered together great store of wealth, with a great number of braue horses for seruice: all which hee put into Balnaluc, a strong towne, whereinto he in triumphant manner entred, with a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and his souldiers singing his praises amiddest the smoke of a thousand pieces of great ordnance, which he caused incessantly to be shot off for the space of two daies together: giuing it out withall (amongst all the ioyfull feasts and triumphs, made for the magnifying and setting forth of his praise and glorie) That his resolution was, to take part with the Christian Emperor, if the great Bassa's, or other his enemies in great place in court, should seeke to crosse his desires, or to formalize his actions or proceedings in this manner of the obtaining of his gouernment.

Sultan Mahomet sendeth for Zellaly to come vnto him to Constantinople.

Now Mahomet doubting what this man, so well acquainted with rebellion, would do, had by diuers messengers sent for him to Constantinople, after the breaking vp of the armie in Hungarie, there of his Imperiall and infinit bountie, to receiue the honorable rewards of his good seruice and valor, the greatnesse whereof he had (as he said) alreadie vnderstood by Hassan Bassa the Generall: which so bound him to the reward thereof, as that his desire and pleasure was, to grace him in court with his owne hands, for the greater testimonie of the loue he bare him, and of the esteeme he had of him. But the craftie and mistrustfull Rebell, doubting that these faire words were all but baits to draw him into his power, to the endangering or assured losse both of his life and libertie, shut his eares against these so sweet charmes, and as a man well aduised, and one which knew that the hand of a Prince iustly offended, is alwayes open for to punish his rebellious subiects, being once in his power, with as great justice in punishing him, as he with wrong and disloyaltie offended him; would in no wise accept of the offer: but ciuilly answered, That hee most humbly thanked the great Sultan, for his so great and honorable offers, and that he was so mindfull of him: but that he for his part desired not any greater reward for the seruices by him done, more than the gouernment which his Maiestie had before promised him, whereof (according to which promise, which hee could not thinke, but to be agreeable to his good liking) he was now possessed, with a resolution to hold and keepe the same for his Maiesties seruice. Which was as much in effect, as for a disloyall subiect to talke with his angrie Soueraigne, with his hand vpon his sword: but with this flie answer, such as it was, Sultan Mahomet for all his greatnesse, must as yet content himselfe, for feare lest if he should haue fought to haue by force remoued him, hee might so haue raised a more dangerous rebellion in Europe, than was already in Asia. Zellaly so politique and resolute a man, and not to seeke what to doe in such matters, being possessed of so great a gouernement, and the Christian Emperour at hand readie to haue backed him, if hee should vpon any discontentment haue reuolted.

The troubles of this yeare 1603 thus ouerpast, the beginning of the next was like vnto a faire blooming tree, which promising great store of fruit, but afterward blasted with the extremitie of the weather, proueth in effect as barren, as it before seemed in hope fruitfull. For beginning with the sweet Westerne windes of peace, it ended with the sterne Northren blasts of warre. The Turkes had oftentimes the last yeare made motion of peace, but especially toward the end thereof; outwardly making shew of a great desire and forwardnesse in themselues thereunto. Which businesse the last yeare begun, was euen with the beginning of this yeare also effectually continued, that Commissioners were on both sides appointed to conferre and conclude vpon the same. Among these Commissioners Colonell Althem was one; who to performe his charge, hauing taken with him the other Commissioners deputed with him for this purpose, with certaine other Captaines, embarqued himselfe with them in thirteene ships from Strigonium, and from thence sayling downe the Riuer, landed with his traine in the Island betwixt Buda and Pesth. Of whose arriuall there, the Turkes of Buda aduertised, and on their part readie, came forthwith thither also, with all the outward shewes that might be, of their most earnest desire for the concluding of peace: whereas our men, who by a thousand effects were assured of the vnfaithfulnesse of the Turkes, and that necessitie, and not the desire of any quietnesse, had drawne them to seeke for peace, to the contrarie shewed

The Turkes encouraged the Turke to proceed to peace

themselues verie backward in this businesse. For why, they knew right well, that the Turkes had not taken this matter in hand, but to ouertake them, and by this time of peace to gaine a time of war more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruell designes. They had the yere before made sufficient proofe of our forces, accompanied with good fortune, which caused them to despaire by strong hand to vanquish and ouercome vs: besides that, they still euerie houre in one place or other received a thousand losses and crosses from our garrisons, who distressed and annoyed them both with their forces, and with driuing of them vnto the extremitie of wants. Our men knew moreouer also, that the troubles of Asia as well from the Rebels as from the Persian which lay to heauie vpon the great Sultan, drew them to this necessitie, to seeke for a breathing time of peace, wherein to repaire that which was in their forces and strength by wars impaired. And euen yet also the manner of the Turkes demeaning of themselues in this action, their delaies, their excuses, & deferring from day to day to conclude vpon some point of this treatie, gaue our men good cause to suspect them of euill meanes, as men respecting their profit, more than their faith: and more subtill and cruell in all their actions, than honorable and valorous. The fifth of Ianuarie was the day by our men expected for the treaty, for as then the Bassa of Buda had appointed with the rest of the commissioners to come into the Isle, to heare what our commissioners should demand, & to entreat of the peace. But he was too true an Infidell to faile of his Infidelitie, and so came not at all, but deceiued our men both of their hope & expectation. At length in stead of himself, letters were brought from him to Colonell Althem, whereby he excused himselfe for not comming, requesting him with the rest of the commissioners, to come ouer the riuer to Buda, the more commodiously for them to confer together, & so the better to conclude their negotiation. Now though Althem for the maiestie of his Prince, and the honor of the State, ought not at the request of these his enemies to haue put himselfe into their power, but to haue stood fast vpon the tearmes of honor, yet to the end that the countrey of Hungarie, so miserably spoiled with warres, should not take occasion to complaine of his negligence in his negotiation of peace, hee resolued to go to Buda, as the Bassa had requested: deeming euery action tending to the hinderance of the common good, to be but in shew honorable, and in deed hurtfull. Vpon which resolution hee sent before the Gentleman of his stable, and his Cooke, with a Gentleman of the Turkes, sent but the day before from the Bassa: which men going aboord together, were assailed with such a cruell tempest vpon the riuer, that neither the skill of the watermen, nor goodnesse of the vessell was able to resist the force thereof, so that the boat was sunke, and the men drowned. An euill presage of the peace to be made, the raging waters as it were foreshewing the troubles to come. But this tempest by the sacrifice of those poore drowned men appeased, Althem and Geiberg, two of the chiefe commissioners, embarked themselues, and so passed ouer the riuer to Buda. At whose arriuall the Turks gaue in shew a thousand testimonies of their ioy for their comming. Neither did the Germans refuse their kind offered courtesies, but largely fed of the good cheere, and filled themselues with the good wines, whereof the Turks had giuen them plentie: and they againe vsing them as kindly, as if they had been their brethren, & conuersing with them as with their owne countrymen. Amidst this carowsing and platters full of good cheere, the proposition of peace, which the Turks meant to demand, were serued in also, and a truce for twelue daies demanded to consider of the matter: during which time it should be lawfull for euerie man without let freely to come and goe whither they would: which was forthwith on both sides agreed vpon. And for better testimony of the Turkes true meaning in this their negotiation of peace, the Bassa in the presence of our commissioners dispatched a Curror toward the great Sultan, to aduertise him of this businesse, and of the proceeding therin, according to the commandement by him before giuen. Which he did, to cause our men to beleeue, that the great Sultan himselfe was desirous of peace, and that his Captaines well affected thereunto, were willing to further the same. Which done, the Bassa presented vnto Colonell Althem two cases full of Turkes armes, of all manner of fashions, verie rich, and cunningly wrought; both carried by a mule, with furniture for an horse, embroydered with gold and pearle, verie sumptuous and rich, as a present from the great Sultan his Lord and Master, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Matthias, hee presented vnto the Colonell, a robe of purple veluet, with sleeues cunningly embroydered with gold and pearle, embossed with fine and curious figures cunningly wrought with the needle: for for the rarenesse thereof as admirable to behold, as for the richnesse thereof to haue been desired: which was by euery man wondered at, when as shortly after it was by Althem presented vnto the Archduke, together with other presents from the Turks. Besides that, the same Bassa in token of friendship, presented vnto Althem himselfe another verie faire and rich robe: all the rest of the Commissioners receiuing also from the Bassa other robes of lesse value, but yet all very rich and sumptuous.

This businesse for this time thus ended, and the truce for twelue days concluded, the Christian Commissioners loded with Presents tooke their leaue of the Turks, with the shewes of their good wils, and so returned backe againe to Pesth. Howbeit these the enemies faire presents still sauoured but of enmitie, being indeed but like to the Presents of Hector and Ajax, tending rather to war than to peace.

Now the death of the most valiant and renowned Lord Nadasta, which at this time happened, was another euil presage of the bad successe of this treatie of peace now at hand: who hauing of long beene a barre vnto the Turks rage in that part of Hungarie where he dwelt, they now after his death, with the violence of their forces, as with an headie streame, bare downe before them all our good fortune in that prouince. This worthie man of great fame and desert, had spent both his yeares and fortune in the most honourable warres against the Turkes: wherein he was so skilfull and expert, that he was of them feared as another Huniades, and of the Christians honoured as another Matthias. He had a thousand times most valiantly fought against these miscreants, and as many times foiled them, to the great benefit of the Christian Commonweale, the aduancement of the Emperours seruice, and the reliefe of his distressed Countrey. These his heroical deeds of armes were engrauen vpon the gates of the Townes and Cities of Hungarie, and within the rockes of Transyluania, hauing both in the one countrey and the other right happily defeated these Infidels. He had the honour to haue receiued the first incursions and attempts of the Turkes, at such time as Amurath the third hauing perfidiously broken the League made with Maximilian the Emperour, with his Forces inuaded Hungarie; and was the first of all the Christian Chiefetaines that made head against them; and being by their sudden comming in by them almost surprised, performed yet great and worthie exploits and seruice against these faithlesse men. It should seeme that good fortune fauoured the Countrey of Hungarie, but onely in respect of him: for he being dead, it died also, burying it selfe as it were in his graue, and him in glorie; not suffering him to grow old, and so to languish in the ruines of his native Countrey. He died of a natural death, about fiftie and foure yeares old, most part whereof he liued in armes, still charged with the burthen of his armour, and euen at the yeelding vp of the ghost yet breathing wars against these the enemies of the Christian Faith. His death was much lamented for of many faithfull Christians, but especially of his owne tenants and subiects, whom he had alwayes kept and preserued in safetie, and still maintained them in all peace and tranquilitie during all these former warres; the Turkes not daring once to assaile them, nor to enter into their territorie, being stayd from so doing by the bulwarke of his valour, right dreadfull to their attempts. Neuer Turke was buried in his Territorie, no more than were the Barbarians vpon the bankes of the riuer Eurotas, his wisedome had so wisely prouided for the preseruation of his people; and his valour so worthily assured them of their health and safetie. He was for his Countrey another Epiminondas, who made his town not only free from the armes and inuasions of their enemies, but also dreadfull to their forces so long as he liued. The Turks on the contrarie part no lesse reioyced for his death; but accounting his country now rich & plentiful (for that it had neuer been by them spoiled) for their most assured prey came now thither on all sides, to haue taken the spoile thereof, and therewith to haue enriched themselues. But as they were about so to haue done, the valiant Collonitz honoring the remembrance of the Lord Nadasti his late fellow and companion in armes, and holding that for his owne which he had left, opposed himselfe with his forces against these rauening wolues. So that they were no sooner entered into this his territorie, but that contrarie to their expectation, they were encountered by this new Nadasti, and by him so ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, that for a good while after they durst no more attempt the like.

valiant champion notable longer to endure the proud insolencie and tyrannie of those barba- G rous people, gathered together his troupes of horsemen, with such other small forces as hee had whereof the Turks hauing made small reckoning, and therefore without order pillaging and ransacking his countrie, were when they least feared, by him vpon the sudden surprised and ouerthrowne, many of them being cut in pieces, a number moe taken prisoners, with all the spoiles they had got, and the rest with such feare chased out of his countrey, as that being glad to haue escaped, they tooke no pleasure for a great while after, to looke into that his prouince againe.

But to returne againe to the Commissioners for the peace to be made betwixt the Great Sultan and the Emperour, the Bassa of Buda, to the end that the Captaines and Gouernours of the Turks and Castles belonging to the Turks, being ignorant of the truce, should not continue H their warlike actions, to the preiudice of his faith giuen; immediately after the departure of the Christian Commissioners from Buda, dispatched diuers courrours towards them, to giue them knowledge thereof, and especially to the Gouernor of Agria, commanding them from thenceforth to abstain from their ordinarie incursions into their enemies territories, and from all other actions of hostilitie, and so to keep themselues quiet vntil they were from him otherwise commanded. This little time of respite and breathing from warre, gaue great contentment vnto the poore Countrey-people, now with warres almost exhausted and spent. And now our souldiours during this time of truce laying their armes aside, ranne by heapes with spades and shouels vnto the places where our armies had sometime lyen encamped, there to delue and search to finde such things as the Armies rising in haste had haply left there buried. I In which action they so busied themselues as if they had beene Labourers in haruest, so that nothing was in the fields to be seene, but men digging and remouing of stones and earth.
A right fooliish businesse, and yet so exceedingly pleasing the greedie mindes of these coue-tous men, as that amiddest their such moiling labour they accounted themselues at great ease.
The Turks also did the like, mingled together with our men, and our men with them, without any iniurie doing one to another either by word or deed. And no doubt it is, but that there they found more trauell than wealth, the greedie desire which drew them into this worke, deceiuing them in effect. And in this mad labour both the parties spent many dayes without any let or iniurie doing either on the one side or the other. The Christians of Pesth also passing ouer the Danubie, went into the victualling houses of the Turks at Buda, whereinto K they were suffered to enter, and at libertie to walke vp and downe the Towne at their pleasure. And so the Turks of Buda likewise came ouer the riuer vnto Pesth, and there walked at their pleasure, no man letting of them. Which manner of liuing was verie commodious and pleasing both for the one side and the other, the Christians buying of the Turks such things as they needed, and the Turks of them likewise. Through which quiet and peaceable intercourse and traffique, the people in general seemed euen in that short time to haue forgotten a great part of their forepassed miseries, this little time of peace, ioyned with security, hauing well assuaged the same. But while these mutual and vnwonted courtesies thus passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks, and the mindes of most men were filled with the expectation of an assured peace to haue beene euen forthwith concluded, the Great Sultan Mahomet L in the middest of all his pleasures and delights died in his Imperial Palace at Constantinople:
the newes whereof being in the euening brought to Buda by a courrour of purpose sent from Constantinople, the Bassa forthwith sent the Captaine of the Sentinels of Buda, to Colonell Geüberg at Pesth, to assure him of the death of the Great Sultan Mahomet, and of the succession of his yong son Achmet into his Empire, now alreadie both at Constantinople and other places thereabout proclaimed Emperour. By which messenger he also wrote vnto Colonel Althem, to certifie him both of the death of the Great Sultan, and of the succession of his sonne, as also that he was by him commanded to continue the negotiation of the peace, and so if he could to conclude the same. For the more euidence whereof, behold the copie of the letters themselues: M

The death of the great Sultan Mahomet.

The Letters of the Bassa of Buda to Colonell Althem.

Our due commendations remembered, noble Lord Gouernour, our deere friend and right honourable neighbour,

A neighbour. Wee haue thought good to aduertise you, that the fourth day after your departure from this citie wee receiued Letters from Constantinople, giuing vs certainely to vnderstand of the death of our most mightie Emperour Mahomet, and of the succession of his sonne Sultan Achmat, into all his dominions and Empires: whereby we were, as his most humble subiects, summoned to yeeld vnto him our oath of faithfull obedience, as vnto our rightfull Lord, and lawfull successor of his father into all his estates and dominions. Moreouer, he particularly commandeth vs; to giue him certaine aduice and knowledge concerning the negotiation of the peace begun betwixt vs and you, by the commandement of his deceased father: promising to confirme and ratifie all that whatsoeuer he shall finde done and agreed vpon concerning that businesse, without any qualification at all. And that if the treatie be not yet concluded and ended, that his will and desire was, that it should be so, according to the iust meanes and assurances B that we should faithfully and carefully together deuise. Whereof I should readily giue him aduice and answer; which I haue deferred to do, vntill I haue receiued your answer, which may instruct me what to resolue vpon. Which your answer I attending, haue staied the Curror of Constantinople, to the intent he may carry backe word vnto our Emperor, what he is to hope for concerning this businesse, by the answer that you shall giue vs. These are now therefore to aduise you, as our deere friend, and a most valiant Gouernor, to set downe that which you shall thinke to be most fit and necessarie in this businesse: giuing you withall to vnderstand, that our new Emperour is a man of resolution euen in these his young yeares, wherein hee now flourisheth, hating idlenesse, deeming no losse greater, and altogether irrepairable, than the losse of time. If then you be still desirous, that the peace betwixt our Emperors should be made and confirmed, I hope you will employ your whole endeuor with speed to determine this most happie negotiation, and so ne-C cessarie for euery mans good. As also auert farre from our owne heads the curses of the common peo- ple, for whom it is most needfull that the peace should for their good and quietnesse bee concluded, seeing that the fruit thereof is expected to be vnto them happie, and the glorie thereof for euer ours, for hauing by our diligence and true endeauour concluded the same. Which maketh me to hope, that when you shall finde your selfe readie to conclude this treatie, you will not bring with you men enemies vnto peace, or such as shal dissuade the same; but rather wise and graue men, which to the vttermost of their power may aduance the same; and finde out good and reasonable meanes to assure an eternall and faithfull peace betwixt our Emperors, vnto which so generall a good euery one of vs is to duetie bound to employ the vttermost of his sufficiencie and power. And thus is that I haue of truth to write vnto you at this time, and
And so I bid you farewell.

Now these Letters although they most concerned the continuation of the treatie of peace, alreadie begun, and were too friendly from an enemie, to haue in them any good meaning, yet did they well assure the Colonell to whom they were written, of the death of the great and late Sultan Mahomet, and of the succession of his sonne Achmat into his Empire, to which end they are here set downe.

This late mightie Monarch, and now nothing but a loathsome lump of dead flesh, the great Sultan Mahomet, departed this life about the latter end of Ianuarie, in the yere of Grace 1604, (according to their computation which begin the yeare at Christmas) when hee had liued about 44 yeares, and thereof raigned eight. He was a man of no great spirit, and yet exceeding E proud, which was the cause that he was both the lesse beloued and feared of his subiects in generall, but especially of the Ianizaries and other his souldiers and men of warre, who scorning his loose gouernment, and grieued to see euen the greatest affaires of his State not onely imparted to women, but by them mannaged and ouerruled also (as by his mother, the Sultanesse his wife, and others) not onely rebelled against him, but were oftentimes in their rages about to haue deposed him. Hee was altogether giuen to sensualitie and voluptuous pleasure, the marks whereof he still carried about with him, a foule swolne, vnwealdy, & ouergrown body, vnfit for any princely office or function: and a minde thereto answerable, wholly giuen ouer vnto idlenesse, pleasure, and excesse, no small meanes for the shortening of his daies, which he ended with obloquie, vnregarded of his subiects, and but of few or none of them lamented.

Mahomet, why he was not regarded of his men of warre.

F He had issue foure sonnes, and three daughters married vnto three of the great Bassaes.

Mahomet his issue.

His first and eldest sonne was called Mahomet (after his owne name) whom he caused to be strangled in his owne sight, vpon suspition of aspiring to the Empire, and conspiring with the Rebels in Asia: but afterward finding him guiltlesse, caused his bodie to be buried in his own Sepulchre, and hanged the Bassa that had misinformed him.

His second sonne died a naturall death, being yet verie young:

His third sonne was Sultan Achmat, who succeeded his father, and came to the Empire by the vntimely death of Mahomet his eldest brother. C

His fourth sonne being then a youth of about sixteene yeares old, was carefully kept within the Seraglio, with such a strait guard set ouer him, as that his name was not to be learned, euen by a good vnderstanding friend of mine, of late lying aboue three moneths together at Constantinople, who most curiously enquired after the same, hauing verie good meanes to haue learned it. He was reported to haue been long since murthered, howbeit that he of late liued, but looking euery day to be by his brothers cruel commandement strangled, which is accounted but a matter of course, and a death hereditarie to all the yonger male children of the Othoman Emperours: the policie for the maintenance of their great Empire entire and whole, so requiring. H

His dead body lyeth buried at Constantinople, in a faire Chappell of white Marble neere vnto the most famous and beautifull Church of S. Sophia) for that onely purpose by himselfe most sumptuously built about fifty foot square, with foure high small round towers, about the which are certain small round galleries of stone: from which the Turkish priests and churchmen, at certain houres, vse to call the people euery day to Church: for they vse no bels themselues, neither will they suffer the Christians to vse any. But the top of this Chappell is built round, like vnto the antient Temples of the heathen gods in Rome. In the midst of this Chappell (being indeed nothing else but this great Sultans Sepulchre) standeth his tombe, which is nothing else but a great vrne or coffin of faire white Marble, wherein lieth his bodie, couered with a great couering of the same stone ouer it, made rising in the midst, and stooping on each side: not much vnlike to the coffins of the antient tombes of the Saxon kings, which are to be seen on the North side of the Quire of S. Pauls Church, and in other places of this land: but that this coffin of the great Sultan is much greater and more stately than are those of the Saxon kings; it being aboue fiue foot high at the end [illegible] of, and by little and little falling toward the feet, couered with a rich hearse of cloth of gold downe to the ground: his turbant standing at his head, and two exceeding great candles of white waxe, about three or foure yards long, standing in great brasse or siluer candlesticks gilded, the one at his head, the other at his feet, which neuer burne, but there stand for shew onely. All the flore of the Chappell beeing couered with mats, and faire Turkie carpets vpon them. And round about this his tomb, euen in the same Chappell, are the like tombes for his wiues and children, but nothing so great and faire. Into this Chappell, or any other the Turks Churches or Chappels, it is not lawfull for either Turke or Christian to enter, but first he must put off his shooes, leauing them at the church or chappell gate, or carrying them in his hand. Neere vnto this chappell, and the great Temple of Sophia, are diuers other chappels of the other great Turks; as of Sultan Selim, this mans grandfather, with his seuen and thirty children about him: of Sultan Amurath, this mans father, with his fiue and fortie children entombed about him. And in other places not far from them, are the chappels and sepulchres of the rest of the great Sultans; as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Baiazet, Sultan Selym the first, Sultan Solyman: all by these great Mahometane Emperors built, whose names they beare. And being all of almost one forme and fashion, haue euery one of them a faire hospitall adioyning vnto them, wherein a great multitude of poore people are daily still relieued. I K L

Some others of the great Bassaes haue their Chappels and Sepulchres, with their great and stately almes-houses also, not much inferiour vnto those of the great Sultans; as namely Ibrahim Bassa, of all the Bassaes that euer were amongst the Turkes the most magnificent, hath his stately chappell, sepulchre, and almes-houses, neere both in place and beautie, vnto that of Solymans. The Turkes burie not at all within their churches, neither are any at all buried within the walls of the citie, but the great Turkish Emperours themselues, with their wiues and children about them, and some few other of their great Bassaes, and those onely in Chappels by themselues built for that purpose. Al the rest of the Turks are buried in the fields; some of the better sort in tombes of marble; but the rest with tombe stones laied vpon them, or with two great stones, the one set vp at the head, and the other at the feet of euerie graue, the greatest part of them being of white Marble, brought from the Isle of Marmora. They will not bury any man where another hath beene buried, accounting it impietie to digge vp another mans bones, M

The Turks bury not in their Churches, neither within the walls of their cities, but in the fields.

A bones. By reason whereof they couer all the best ground about the city with such great white stones: which for the infinit number of them, are thought sufficient to make another wal about the citie. But not to stand longer vpon the manner of the Turks burials, leauing this great Sultan to rest with his ancestors, let vs now prosecute the course of our Historie.

for euer. So the actions of Princes are like vnto strange lights appearing by night in the ayre, which hold mens eyes busied with the intentiue beholding of them, some thereof diuining well, and some others euill, according to the diuersitie of the beholders conceits and humours.

The treatie for peace also in Hungarie was notwithstanding the death of Mahomet, by the Bassa of Buda still continued, who (as hee sayd) by the new Sultan authorised, by letters incited the Gouernour of Strigonium to repaire vnto some such conuenient place as wherein the matter might be safely concluded. Vpon which motion the Gouernour with the rest of the Commissioners departing from Strigonium, the fourth of Februarie came to Colloniz his Campe, from whence they were by the souldiers most brauely conducted along the bankes of Danubius, vnto the ships which lay readie for them, to carrie them downe the Riuer to Pesth: during which time of their passage nothing was to bee seene or heard but fire and smoake, and the thundering of the great artillerie both from Pesth and Buda, the Christians and the Turks both striuing to excell each other in these their shewes of joy and triumph. The Gouernour with the rest of his companie beeing happily arriued at Pesth, met there with a number of the better sort of the Turkes sent thither by the Bassa to meet him, and in his name to greet him: who with a thousand honours, againe receiued and saluted them. All shewes of kindnesse, and signes of the happie successe of the negotiation begun. And now the Christians desirous to excell the Turks, as well in courtesie as in valor, appointed a number of them the next day to goe to Buda, to inuite certaine of the chiefest and most honourable men amongst the Turkes, vnto a banquet at Pesth: Who willingly accepted of the offer, and so came six hundred of the better sort of them ouer the Danubie to Pesth, where the feast was most sumptuously and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten faire and rich pauillions, set vp for the entertainement of them a little distant from Pesth, in a faire place, and fit for this purpose. In the first whereof were placed three verie proud and stately tables. At the first of which tables, on the right hand, were set the Commissioners for the Emperour, with the two Bassaes, and one Mufti or Arch-Priest, with a Mytre vpon his head, a long furred gowne vpon his backe, and vnder that, a robe of most fine and exceeding rich silke. Vpon the left hand, at the same table were placed certaine of the Turkes Lords, and other great men. At the other two tables were set other of the best sort of the Turkes mingled with the Christians: and so at all the other tables in like order were set a Christian and a Turke, vntill that the six hundred Turkes were placed, with as many Christians among them: who by their good countenance and behauiour one of them to another, might haue seemed to haue beene all of one and the same Beliefe, Nation, and Countrey. The Turkes after the manner of their superstition, would not sit downe before the setting of the Sunne, which beeing set, they with a thousand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Archpriest, set themselues downe at the tables in order as is aforesaid, and there merrily reposed themselues vntill nine of the clocke at night. At which time the tables with great reuerence taken away, the Turkes as men well contented, and full of joy, returned to Buda, with much glee, and as it were witnessing vnto heauen and earth the great contentment they had receiued. And yet was all this faire shew nothing else but deepe dissimulation mixt with most foule treacherie. For a little before their departure, they of Pesth were aduertised, That the Turkes in great number well appointed, were come out from Buda to surprise Pesth, during the time of the feast; beeing in hope that the Christians all busied in this action, had left the walls of the towne vnfurnished of defence. But they too well acquainted with their treacheries, to put any trust or confidence in their faire shewes, had as well prouided for the defence and safetie of the towne, as for the magnificence of the feast abroad. By which meanes the Turkes disappointed of their intended purpose, were in the attempting thereof repulsed, and so glad to returne as they came, backe againe to Buda.

The Turkes commissioners disauow the practise for the surprising of Pesth.

The next day after, the Commissioners for the Emperour complained vnto the Bassa and the rest of the Turkes Commissioners, of this so treacherous dealing: who excused themselues as altogether ignorant thereof, disauowing the action for want of successe, which had it beene effected, they would to the vttermost haue shamefully maintained. An ordinarie course

A course among the Great, with speech and countenance in shew to condemne that for want of effect, which they in heart and minde could for their owne profit haue wished to haue beene performed.

The commissioners for the emperor refuse any more to go to Buda.

Neuertheless the Turkes the next day (as if no such thing had beene meant) requested the Christian Commissioners to come to Buda, as they had done to Pesth: but they, as well by proofe, as by report, perceiuing the euill meaning of the Turkes; excusing themselues, returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to aduenture themselues into the power of their faithlesse enemies; yet left they Geuberg at Pesth, with commission to continue the negotiation for peace with the Bassa of Buda, if he should finde him thereunto disposed, or any hope of bringing the treatie to good effect or issue.

The message of Countie Tsolan from the great Sultan to the Emperour.

B Mahomet the late Sultan had a little before his death (as is before declared) set at libertie the Countie Tsolan (carried away prisoner to Constantinople after the taking of Alba Regalis, and sent him with letters of credence to intreat of a peace to bee made with the Emperor; with promise to yeeld himselfe againe prisoner, if he failed to obtaine the same: for whome the French Embassadour became pledge. Hee hauing now deliuered his letters of credence vnto the Emperour, and commaunded to say what hee had further in charge, declared, That the great Sultan offered to deliuer vnto his Maiestie the strong Townes of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Canisia, in exchange of Transyluania and Valachia, whereunto he layed claime, promising on his part to make a most firme and sure peace with the Emperour for the time to come, and to giue thereof such assurance as should of him reasonably be demaunded.

C The Bassa of Buda also amongst other the faire remonstrances of peace, had offered vnto the Emperours Commissioners to restore Canisia and Agria for Pesth, Hatwan, and Vacia, together with the remission of all such payments and tributes as were by the Emperour due vnto the Great Sultan for the Kingdome of Hungarie. All which faire shewes and offers, though much vnreasonable, were nothing but windie wordes to delay the time, and subtill baits to deceiue the Christians: for the euent and issue, which giueth life to all actions, with a forme vnto them agreeable, hath by experience taught the Christians, That all the glorious and glozing proceedings of the Turkes in this businesse of the peace, so much wished and expected of the Christians, were but nets and snares wherewith to entangle them with the vaine hope thereof, vntill that they in the meane time might fortifie their townes with new supplies of men, munition, victuals, and whatsoeuer else was

The Turkes in all the negotiation for peace did nothing but dissemble with the Emperours Commissioners.

D needfull, the more easily afterward to annoy them at their pleasure, and so to laugh at their simplicitie and light beleefe: For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his sonne (yet by reason of his minoritie vnder the tuition of his mother and other the great Bassaes) succeeding in his place, the Turkes aggrauated the conditions of the peace, and propounded them so farre from reason, as that any man might see them now to haue no more desire or regard of peace, after that they had dispatched that for which they seemed before desirous thereof; insomuch, that they sent a messenger in post from Constantinople vnto the Bassa of Buda, to forbid him vpon the paine of his head any further to continue the treatie of peace, but forthwith to renew the warre. So this peace so much expected, and now of the people generally holden

The treatie for peace with the Turkes commeth to nothing.

E for as good as concluded, suddenly vanished into smoake, nothing remaining of that bodie, composed of so many wishes, more than a vaine expectation, now dispersed with the winde of the Turkish treacherie. And yet during the time of this negotiation for peace sought for by the Turkes both by often letters and messengers, many a solemne oath had passed both from the Sultan Mahomet and from the Visier Bassa, for their faithfull and sincere dealing in the treatie thereof, as, By the God of heauen and earth; By the bookes of Moyses; By the Psalmes of Dauid; and By the holy Euangelists; oathes much vsed of Turks, and reserued for their greatest solemnities, and strongest assurances of their leagues and promises: all which for all that hauing serued but as baits and traines to beguile the simple and well meaning men, lay now neglected and vnregarded: such is the faith and assurance which men haue from faithlesse and

F vntrustie men.

Diuers reports concerning the Turkes great preparations and designes.

The treatie of peace thus broken off, it was foorthwith by some bruited, That Achmat the great Sultan, vnder the conduct of the Visier Bassa his Gouernour, was himselfe in person with a most huge armie about to come into Hungarie: Some others in the meane time reporting, that he was letted so to do by reason of the Persian warres, whereunto he was of necessitie to for euer. So the actions of Princes are like vnto ſtrange lights appearing by night in the ayre, which hold mens eyes buſied with the intentiue beholding of them, ſome thereof diuining well, and ſome others euill, according to the diuerſitie of the beholders conceits and humours.

The treatie for peace alſo in Hungarie was notwithſtanding the death of Mahomet, by the Baſſa of Buda ſtill continued, who (as hee ſayd) by the new Sultan authoriſed, by letters incited the Gouernour of Strigonium to repaire vnto ſome ſuch conuenient place as wherein the matter might be ſafely concluded. Vpon which motion the Gouernour with the reſt of the Commiſſioners departing from Strigonium, the fourth of Februarie came to Cellonitz his Campe, from whence they were by the ſouldiers moſt brauely conducted along the bankes of Danubius, vnto the ſhips which lay readie for them, to carrie them downe the Riuer to Peſth: during which time of their paſſage nothing was to bee ſeene or heard but fire and ſmoake, and the thundering of the great artillerie both from Peſth and Buda, the Chriſtians and the Turks both ſtriuing to excell each other in theſe their ſhewes of joy and triumph. All ſhewes of kindneſſe, and ſignes of the happie ſucceſſe of the negotiation begun. And now the Chriſtians deſirous to excell the Turks, as well in courteſie as in valor, appointed a number of them the next day to goe to Buda, to inuite certaine of the chiefeſt and moſt honourable men amongſt the Turkes, vnto a banquet at Peſth: Who willingly accepted of the offer, and ſo came ſix hundred of the better ſort of them ouer the Danubie to Peſth, where the feaſt was moſt ſumptuouſly and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten faire and rich pauillions, ſet vp for the entertainement of them a little diſtant from Peſth, in a faire place, and fit for this purpoſe. In the firſt whereof were placed three verie proud and ſtately tables. At the firſt of which tables, on the right hand, were ſet the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, with the two Baſſaes, and one Mufti or Arch-Prieſt, with a Mytre vpon his head, a long furred gowne vpon his backe, and vnder that, a robe of moſt fine and exceeding rich ſilke. Vpon the left hand, at the ſame table were placed certaine of the Turkes Lords, and other great men. At the other two tables were ſet other of the beſt ſort of the Turkes mingled with the Chriſtians: and ſo at all the other tables in like order were ſet a Chriſtian and a Turke, vntill that the ſix hundred Turkes were placed, with as many Chriſtians among them: who by their geſture, countenance and behauiour one of them to another, might haue ſeemed to haue beene all of one and the ſame Beliefe, Nation, and Countrey. The Turkes after the manner of their ſuperſtition, would not ſit downe before the ſetting of the Sunne, which beeing ſet, they with a thouſand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Archprieſt, ſet themſelues downe at the tables in order as is aforeſaid, and there merrily repoſed themſelues vntill nine of the clocke at night. At which time the tables with great reuerence taken away, the Turkes as men well contented, and full of joy, returned to Buda, the inſtruments of muſicke, trumpets, and Drummes, on euerie ſide ſounding about them with much glee, and as it were witneſſing vnto heauen and earth the great contentment they had receiued. And yet was all this faire ſhew nothing elſe but deepe diſſimulation mixt with moſt foule treacherie. For a little before their departure, they of Peſth were aduertiſed, That the Turkes in great number well appointed, were come out from Buda to ſurpriſe Peſth, during the time of the feaſt; beeing in hope that the Chriſtians all buſied in this action, had left the walls of the towne vnfurniſhed of defence. But they too well acquainted with their treacheries, to put any truſt or confidence in their faire ſhewes, had as well prouided for the defence and ſafetie of the towne, as for the magnificence of the feaſt abroad. By which meanes the Turkes diſappointed of their intended purpoſe, were in the attempting thereof repulſed, and ſo glad to returne as they came, backe againe to Buda.

The Turkes commiſſioners diſauow the practiſe for the ſurpriſing of Peſth.

The next day after, the Commiſſioners for the Emperour complained vnto the Baſſa and the reſt of the Turkes Commiſſioners, of this ſo treacherous dealing: who excuſed themſelues as altogether ignorant thereof, diſauowing the action for want of ſucceſſe, which had it beene effected, they would to the vttermoſt haue ſhamefully maintained. An ordinarie courſe

A courſe among the Great, with ſpeech and countenance in ſhew to condemne that for want of effect, which they in heart and minde could for their owne profit haue wiſhed to haue beene performed.

The commiſſioners for the emperor refuſe any more to go to Buda.

Neuertheleſſe the Turkes the next day (as if no ſuch thing had beene meant) requeſted the Chriſtian Commiſſioners to come to Buda, as they had done to Peſth: but they, as well by proofe, as by report, perceiuing the euill meaning of the Turkes; excuſing themſelues, returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to aduenture themſelues into the power of their faithleſſe enemies; yet left they Geiberg at Peſth, with commiſſion to continue the negotiation for peace with the Baſſa of Buda, if he ſhould finde him thereunto diſpoſed, or any hope of bringing the treatie to good effect or iſſue.

B Mahomet the late Sultan had a little before his death (as is before declared) ſet at libertie the Countie Tſolan (carried away priſoner to Conſtantinople after the taking of Alba Regalis, and ſent him with letters of credence to intreat of a peace to bee made with the Emperor; with promiſe to yeeld himſelfe againe priſoner, if he failed to obtaine the ſame: for whome the French Embaſſadour became pledge. Hee hauing now deliuered his letters of credence vnto the Emperour, and commaunded to ſay what hee had further in charge, declared, That the great Sultan offered to deliuer vnto his Maieſtie the ſtrong Townes of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Caniſia, in exchange of Tranſyluania and Valachia, whereunto he layed claime, promiſing on his part to make a moſt firme and ſure peace with the Emperour for the time to come, and to giue thereof ſuch aſſurance as ſhould of him reaſonably be demaunded.

The Turkes in all the negotiation for peace did nothing but diſſemble with the Emperours Commiſſioners.

C The Baſſa of Buda alſo amongſt other the faire demonſtrances of peace, had offered vnto the Emperours Commiſſioners to reſtore Caniſia and Agria for Peſth, Hatwan, and Vacia, together with the remiſſion of all ſuch payments and tributes as were by the Emperour due vnto the Great Sultan for the Kingdome of Hungarie. All which faire ſhewes and offers, though much vnreaſonable, were nothing but windie wordes to delay the time, and ſubtill baits to deceiue the Chriſtians: for the euent and iſſue, which giueth life to all actions, with a forme vnto them agreeable, hath by experience taught the Chriſtians, That all the glorious and glozing proceedings of the Turkes in this buſineſſe of the peace, ſo much wiſhed and expected of the Chriſtians, were but nets and ſnares wherewith to entangle them with the vaine hope thereof, vntill that they in the meane time might for-

So this peace ſo much expected, and now of the people generally holden

And yet during the time of this negotiation for peace ſought for by the Turkes both by often letters and meſſengers, many a ſolemne oath had paſſed both from the Sultan Mahomet and from the Viſier Baſſa, for their faithfull and ſincere dealing in the treatie thereof, as, By the God of heauen and earth; By the bookes of Moyſes; By the Pſalmes of Dauid; and By the holy Euangeliſts; oathes much vſed of Turks, and reſerued for their greateſt ſolemnities, and ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their leagues and promiſes: all which for all that hauing ſerued but as baits and traines to beguile the ſimple and well meaning men, lay now neglected and vnregarded: ſuch is the faith and aſſurance which men haue from faithleſſe and

F vntruſtie men.

The treatie of peace thus broken off, it was foorthwith by ſome bruited, That Achmat the great Sultan, vnder the conduct of the Viſier Baſſa his Gouernour, was himſelfe in perſon with a moſt huge armie about to come into Hungarie: Some others in the meane time reporting, that he was letted ſo to do by reaſon of the Perſian warres, whereunto he was of neceſſitie to to send the greatest part of his forces: so that hee would but onely send one of his great Bas- C saes with the remainder of his so great an armie against the Christians in Hungarie, being before sworne neuer to returne againe vnto Constantinople, vntill he had brought the countries of Transyluania and Valachia, with the remainder of Hungarie, vnder the obeysance of the great Sultan, together with the countrey of Austria, and especially the strong citie of Vienna, the end of the Turkish Emperors conquests: and that to this purpose the Grand Seignior had with great rigour in all places leuied great summes of money vpon his subiects for the maintenance of his so great an armie. It was by others reported also, That onely the preparations for so great an armie should bee made this yeare, the Turkes beeing resolued to doe much therewith the next yeare, and therefore willing to bestow much, in hope with so great and puissant an armie as they were about to raise, to make an end of the warres in Hun- H garie, and not to returne vntill they had conquered all the rest of that Kingdom, [illegible] reliques whereof the fortune of the Othoman Emperours had stayed: so that all handy crafts men were set to worke by day and night, not onely to forge weapons, to cast great ordnance, and to make pouder, but to prepare all other things necessarie also for so great an exploit.

All these great preparations were made for the seruice of the Visier Bassa for the warre in Hungarie, and of Cicala Bassa in Persia, whereof hee was appointed Generall, hauing before presumptuously promised, vtterly to ruinate the Persians estate, and with so great a power euen to swallow him vp. And indeed these Easterne warres greatly troubled the Turkes; newes comming still concerning the conquests of the Persian vpon his territories; and that I Babylon reported to haue bin taken by the Persian king. euen of late the Persian King prosecuting his victories, had taken Babylon, with all the countrey thereabout: and that diuers other townes and cities, more mooued with feare than with the faith wherewith they had bound themselues vnto the Turks, now yeelded themselues vnto the Persian, as weary of the Turkes seruitude, and desirous of their antient libertie. And yet for all that, the Turkes (as they are wise to dissemble their losses, and to strike a feare into

Babylon discomfited, all his armie ouerthrowne, and hee himselfe taken prisoner; so that the Turks forces before distracted, should now wholly ioyne together, to the vtter ruine and destruction of the Christians in Hungarie. And the more to confirme this euill newes, it was reported, That the Beglerbeg of Græcia had raysed a great power to joyne with the Visier Bassa his forces, to the intent to leaue nothing vnconquered in Hungarie. For the better effecting whereof, it was said also, That the Visier Bassa had caused a great number of vessels loded with pouder and other warlike prouision to bee brought by water out of Ægypt to Belgrade, to ruinate the estate of the Christians. All which reports were by the Turks giuen out, to couer their owne mishaps, and to terrifie their enemies: as knowing right well, warres to depend much vpon reports, and that a false bruit beleeued, worketh oftentimes the effect of a thing in deed done. Howsoeuer it was, those so dreadfull reports might well haue serued to haue stirred vp the spirits of the Christians to haue prouided for their owne defence, and to haue stood vpon their guard: for hee that fayleth to prouide against the preparations of his enemie, well deserueth either bondage or death, which soeuer shall befall L him, for hauing by his negligence betrayed his owne abilitie and power to haue withstood him.

The great report of the Turks preparations and forces had now dasht all the talke of peace at Constantinople, and the hot fire of ambition had quite scorched the sweet flowers appeaand to confound the forces of the Christian Emperour, hauing so many Kingdomes within his Empire, so many armouries stored for his seruice, and such store of treasure readie for his designes, promising vnto him most happie and easie successe both in the one and other expedition, euen at one and the selfe same time: so that hee might vanquish the Persian by Ci- M the rest, the Imperiall citie of Constantinople. He like vnto a young Alexander, occupieth as justice and clemencie vnto good Princes are the surest bonds to keepe their subiects fast

But leauing the Turkes busie about their preparations for the accomplishing of their young Emperours high designes, let vs returne into Hungarie, taking Transyluania in our way, the wofull miseries of which countrey my minde abhorreth to thinke vpon, and my pen thereof to write. This Prouince, sometime much renowned for the great victories obtained against the Turkes by the inhabitants thereof, vnder the leading of their Prince Sigismund Bator, and others, and abounding with plenty of all things, was now not by any inuasion of the Turkes, but by ciuill discord amongst themselues, and rebellion against the Emperor, now their Souc-raigne, so wasted and spoyled by the souldiers on all sides, that many of the poore inhabitants for want of food fell downe dead as they went in the streets and fields: miserable wretches, algreedie souldier still spoiling or deuouring all. By long continuance of which daily outrages the fields at length lay now vntilled, the pastures vnstored and neglected, and all things else vnmanured and quite out of course: by means whereof, the famine so encreased, that the poore peasants of the countrie hauing eaten vp for great dainties all the dogs and cats, mice and rats, that they could get, fell to eating of dead horses, and the lothsome carrion of other hunger-starued beasts. It is reported also, That one man should eat another: and that at Hermanstat a woman hauing six children, did among them eat one another, vntill they were at length all six deuoured: and to the contrarie, that two men did eat their owne mother: yea theeues, and other malefactors hanged for their villanies, were by the poore and miserable hungrie peo- An horrible famine.

but vpon the roots of weeds, greene hearbs, and the leaues of trees. For remedie of which so Prouince should be holden at Dewa: wherein it was accorded, That all hostilitie set apart, An assembly of the States of Transyluania, for the appeasing of the troubles there.

the Gentlemen of Transyluania hauing by their rebellion forfeited both their liues and lands, should be pardoned their liues, with three fourth parts of their lands reserued vnto them, and that for ready mony they might of the Emperor redeeme the fourth part also. But concerning the moueables of such as were dead in the time of these troubles, and alreadie confiscat vnto the Emperour, they should so remaine; and that they should pay their dismes, or tenth part of their wine and fruits, vnto the Emperour. And further, That there should be no further ex-F ercise of Religion permitted vnto them, but onely the Romish Religion: and that the townes of Cronstadt and Clausenburg should within the space of three weekes, pay the one twentie thousand dollars, and the other eight thousand; and the magistrates of those townes should deliuer the keyes of their townes, with all their power, into the hands of the Empe-

rours Lieutenant: and that the Gentlemen of these townes which would not be accounted in the number of the Rebels, should for the safetie of their persons take letters of pardon for their rebellion, of the Generall of the armie. This pacification gaue some little time of breathing vnto this poore distressed country, which bared of all strength, and as it were vpon the graues brinke, ha[illegible] but euen the last gaspe to giue; and the country people began againe to giue themselues vnto their wonted labors, in hope at length to reape the profit thereof themselues; but alas all in vaine: for why, the rauening souldiers inured to prey, after their woonted manner made hauocke and spoile of all things, leauing nothing vnto the poore countreyman, but his labour for his paine, and time enough to bewaile his manifold and remedilesse miseries: the causes whereof were the Nobilitie and Gentlemen themselues; who not liking to be gouerned, or rather (as they tooke it) oppressed by the Germanes, and hau[illegible] not vpon any desire they had of peace, but rather by necessitie inforced, yeelded vnto the [illegible]n aforesaid, ceased not still vnderhand to incite the souldiers (ready enough of themselues to do mischiefe) and in what they might to trouble the gouernment of the State by the Germans, being vnto them (as they accounted of them) but strangers. All which their doings Basta the Emperours Lieutenant well perceiuing, caused three of the greatest of the Gentlemen of the countrey, and whome hee most suspected to bee the authours of these troubles, to bee apprehended and fast mured vp betwixt two strong wals in an old ruinous monasterie; whither their friends afterwards comming to haue visited them, and finding them starued to death, were therewith much abashed, as were also other their complices, as soone as they heard thereof. But leauing them to worke themselues further troubles, let vs againe returne vnto the Turkes affaires.

The troubles of Transyluania sterelly maintained by the Nobilitie of the Countrey.

A seuere and miserable kind of punishment.

The treatie of peace betwixt the Christians and the Turks quite broken off, & the war againe begun.

Now was all the hope of peace betwixt the Christians and the Turks become desperate, the Turks making thereof no more account, seeing that according to their desire they had prouided Alba-Regalis, Agria, and Buda, of their necessarie prouisions. They had in foure wagons put into Agria the pay due vnto their garrisons; so that their affaires being now in good estate, and their courages reuiued, they began to scoffe and [illegible]t at our credulitie, to beleeue that they had had any purpose to conclude vpon any thing that was not agreeing with their profit, how far soeuer it were differing from their honor or from their faith: So that now these faithlesse men began againe to renew their wonted incursions and pillages vpon the Christians, with all other manner of hostilitie, and that in more cruell manner than euer before: and our Hussars on the other side well requited them with the like, being as well contented as they with these manner of doings, their whole fortune depending vpon the points of their weapons, and euer ready to the seruice of their prince for their pay. Now it fortuned that fourscore of the Turks going forth to seeke for bootie, chanced to meet with certaine of these Hussars, who finding themselues too weake to encounter with our men, and betaking themselues to flight, were certaine of them taken prisoners, and so brought vnto the Generall, vnto whom they vpon examination confessed, That the Turkes much maruelled at the simplicitie and foolishnesse of the Christians, to beleeue that they were desirous of peace, and not to haue discouered their so manifest intentions to the contrary, tending onely to the pleasuring of themselues, and the annoying of them their enemies, to the strengthning of themselues, and destruction of the Christians, as by proofe it appeared, so soon as their desires were accomplished, vnto the preiudice of their enemies: and that their yong Emperor was alwaies against this treatie of peace, whatsoeuer shew hee had made to the contrarie, constrained thereunto by the victories and conquests of the Persian King; all his wishes and desires aiming at no other marke, than at the generall ruine of Christendome. Our garrisons also seeing themselues charged by the Turks, tooke vp arms likewise, and requited them with like outrages, as they did. They of Pappa, and Vesprinium, were the first which began these broiles after the treatie of the peace, who hauing joyned their forces together, and making head toward Alba-Regalis, met with a number of Turkes, driuing of sheepe and cattell thither, whome they surprised, and together with their cattell carried them away with them prisoners. Which good hap was seconded with the libertie of twentie Christian prisoners from Buda, who one night seeing their keepers oppressed with sleep and with wine, cut their throats, and so happily escaped ouer the riuer to Pesth.

Now

Now while these troubles betwixt the Christians and the Turks (after the treatie of peace broken off) thus began againe in Hungarie, the Turkes, beside the rebellion in Asia, were together by the eares in the prouince of Bosna. Zellaly hauing by force joyned with policie, driuen Zeffer Bassa (as is aforesaid) out of Bosna, and possessed himselfe of that Prouince, thought himselfe now sure enough within the strength of his gouernment, although he being by the Great Sultan sent for to Constantinople, had refused to come, as knowing right well himselfe to hold that so great a gouernment much against his will and pleasure. But Zeffer Bassa now supported with the authoritie of the Great Sultan, and desirous to be reuenged of the great dishonour and losse he had before receiued from Zellaly his enemie, with a great armie suddenly entered into Bosna, and so comming vnto Zellaly, fearing as then no such matter, ouerthrew him with all his power, and neuer left pursuing of him, vntill he had chased him quite out of the Prouince, and so againe recouered the gouernment thereof. But short was the joy the Bassa receiued of this so pleasing a victorie; for within few dayes after he died, comforting himselfe onely in this, that he died not vnreuenged. Of all which things the great Bassa's of the Court vnderstanding, and loth to lose so great a souldier as was Zellaly (who as a man distressed, was now making shift for himselfe) or by vsing of him hardly, to deterre the other Asian rebels from comming in, and yet not willing to trust him with so great a gouernment as was the prouince of Bosna; they to prouide for all euents, appointed him to be gouernor of Temeswar; and Begedes Bassa (before gouernor there) to succeed Zeffer Bassa in the gouernment of Bosna: so contenting all parties, to keepe their forces whole and entire against the Christians.

Zeffer Bassa recouereth the gouernment of Bosna from Zellaly, and shortly after dieth.

Zellaly made gouernour of Temeswar.

The miseries of the Hungarians.

But as the Turks were troubled with their affaires in Bosna, so the Christians were no lesse, but rather more busied with theirs both in Transyluania and Hungarie. The Estates of Hungarie had appointed a general meeting at Possonium, wherein the Archduke Matthias was to sit as President, there to consult of the means for the maintenance of this yeres wars against the Turks. But as the Archduke was about to haue entred into the citie in the midst of his souldiers such a fire vpon the sudden arose in the citie, as consumed the greatest part thereof: an euill presage of the action then in hand, and a wofull spectacle to behold, with the terror whereof all mens mindes possessed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Archduke, (as was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as more necessarie and concerning them than the other. Besides that, the miseries then to be seene in the other parts of Hungarie yet holden by the Christians, were both great and lamentable: for beside the harmes therein done by the Turks, the regiment of Colonel Althem had made such spoile and hauock all ouer the countrey where it lay, that the townes and people in generall so grieuously complained thereof vnto the Emperour, that he mooued with their just complaints, caused the authors of these so great outrages to be apprehended and brought prisoners to Vienna, where some of them were beheaded, and some others of them hanged: Beside whom so condemned and executed, there were some other Captaines and lieutenants, of whom some denying the fact, and other some standing vpon the justifying of that they had done, as thereunto by extreme necessitie enforced, were for their further triall sent prisoners vnto Prague, where they were committed vnto prison into the castle, vntill their causes might be heard. Among which captains and lieutenants, and other such great officers, was one Genderot Colonel Althem his Antient, who most wickedly but a little before had slaine Nudercy a gentleman of good sort and his fellow-companion in armes: for which murther he was committed prisoner into a very high and strong tower within the castle (wherein Countie Paradiser, who fould Canisia vnto the Turks, lay sometime prisoner) vntill his trial might within a few dayes after be made. The horror of which criminal place, together with the guilt of conscience, so troubled and wounded the minde of Genderot, as that all the hope now to saue his life, was by making an escape, & so to auoid the stroke of justice. Which he happily brought to passe by the helpe of one of his lacquies, who had found means to bring vnto him a long cord, where by straining himselfe out at a little window (whereby it was thought almost impossible for any man to haue got out) he in safetie got down to the ground, and there hauing two good horses readie for him, he with his man fled amain, and so escaped, his keepers drunken ouer night, being in the morning found yet sleeping, without perceiuing of any thing, whose drunkennes & fauor toward the prisoner had had giuen him means to escape. The rest of the Captaines and Lieutenants in prison at Prague were some of them beheaded, and some of them hanged, and the rest at the intercession of the Nobilitie of Austria, and of other great men, pardoned, yet with condition, That they should pay the fines set vpon them, and serue the Emperor in his warres three moneths of their owne charge without pay. Some few of the common souldiers, to the terrour of others, had two of the fore-fingers of their right hands cut off, and afterward fast nailed vnto gibbets set vp by the high wales side.

In like manner also the regiment of Colonell Meysberg rose in mutinie for their pay & came and encamped at Sneche, about a league from Vienna; threatning to destroy the countrey, and to kill the chiefe men therein, if they were not paied their pay. Which rebellious mutinie the Captaines did what they might to appease; they besought them, but in vain; they entreated them, but to no purpose; they promised them pay, but preuailed not; yea, the Colonell himselfe thrust himselfe into the midst of them, with most earnest prayers, and his hands cast vp, putting them in mind of their duty, and laying before them the danger of most assured death and dishonour, if they continued further to proceed in that their disloyaltie, whereunto their headstrong furie so disorderedly led them. But they as men enraged, carried headlong with their furie, breathing nothing but threats and destruction, and by no prayers or persuasion to be moued, presently made choice of another Chiefetaine, vnder whose conduct and leading they resolued to rifle the suburbs of Vienna, and with the spoile of them to pay themselues. Vpon which resolution they marched on, and so drew neere vnto the city: with which their so great and dangerous an insolencie the Gouernors of the citie moued (the sufferance wherof they accounted to be vnto themselues both dishonorable & harmfull) they on the other side resolued by plaine force to represse them, and by iust armes to chastise them, who were not otherwise to be reclaimed. But such be the miserable calamities of warre, where violent remedies must purge out of the body of the commonweale the good humors together with the bad, so to recouer the health thereof: which remedies, not but vpon necessitie to be vsed, are so quicke and violent in their working, as that they affoord not leysure to discern the whole and sound from the sicke and infected, to saue the one, and to spill the other; but that they must altogether run the selfesame way. For albeit that the whole Regiment was in this mutinous action, and so all in like danger, yet were they not therof all alike guilty, many of them being euen against their wils and good liking carried away headlong, as with the violent course of an headie riuer.

Now the Captaines of the townes with their troupes and companies, strengthened with some other supplie sent from other places, were to set forward against these rebellious mutiners, and to frustrate their designes: for the greater strengthening of whom, diuers of the burgesses of the towne were enforced to enter into this action also: amongst whome, there were two accounted very honest religious men, who by all meanes sought to excuse themselues from going, labouring both by liuely reasons, and by the word of God, to proue, that they neither might nor ought of right to enter into armes against their Christian brethren, enforced with extreamities, for want of their due pay, to forget their duetie, and to doe that beseemed them not. But what auaileth it to alleadge either reason or law amongst the clattering of armes; the noise whereof is so great, as that Reason and Law cannot there bee heard. These two men seeing themselues enforced to goe, and much grieued in conscience to doe that they were enioyned to doe, and to helpe to shed the guiltlesse bloud of their innocent brethren (as they accounted them) entered both of them into a most strange and wofull resolution, which was to die themselues; rather than to embrue their hands with the bloud of the guiltlesse: whereupon one of them hauing oftentimes called vpon the name of Iesus, with his owne sword thrust himselfe through the body, and so died. The other vpon the like resolution threw himselfe into the riuer, and so perished also: men worthie to be pitied for their conscience sake, but iustly to be condemned for their so weake and desperat a resolution. In fine, the rebellious mutiners seeing in what perill they were, being euen now readie to be charged, and withall considering the weakenesse of their power in comparison of them that came against them, thought it best vpon the sight of so great a tempest to take like sayle; and so changing their former determination, and laying downe their armes, craued pardon of the Archduke; who graciously granted it them, and so tooke them to his mercie; yet with condition, that they should should againe returne vnto their garrisons, and deliuer into his hands the ringleaders & chiefe authors of that mutinie to be punished according to their deserts, as afterwards they were; the ordinarie end of such insolent and disordered actions, which haue nothing assured vnto them but death, which (all things else failing) attendeth onely vpon them.

But while the Christians thus diuided were at variance among themselues, the Turks were readie enough to take aduantage of such their dangerous discord. And first of all, Zellaly the old Rebell, but now Gouernour of Temeswar, hauing in his craftie head plotted the taking of the citie of Lippa by surprize, and to that purpose gathering the greatest power that hee was able to make, in the euening set forward from Temeswar, and so trauelling by night, came to Lippa, vnto the wals whereof he planted scaling ladders, and at the same time labored to haue forced the gates, in hope so to haue gained the towne: which was done with such a terrible noyse and outcrie as was possible by the Turkes to bee made, after that they were once discouered, thereby to haue dismayed the Christians within the towne; who well acquainted with such stratagemes of their enemies, and now therewith awaked, came readily to the walls, and there so well defended themselues and their Towne, that the Turkes repulsed, were glad to giue ouer the assault, and hauing lost a number of their men, with all speed to retire; vpon whome the Christians sallying out, slew many of them in that their disordered retreat, little differing from plaine flight, and tooke many moe of them prisoners: yea Zellaly, who not many houres before had thought to haue surprised Lippa, was now glad himselfe to haue recouered the walls of Temeswar. Some of the Turkes that were there taken prisoners beeing examined, reported, That the armie that was this yeare to come into Hungarie, was like to bee verie great, and that a part thereof was now come to Belgrade, expecting there the comming of the Tartars, who were together with them to enter into Hungarie: and that by reason of the warres with the Persian, which deuoured almost all the souldiers in Constantinople, and yet could not bee therewith satisfied, the great Sultan had commanded, That all such as were able to beare armes, as well in Bosna, as in that part of Hungarie which was subiect vnto him, and in the other Prouinces thereunto adioyning, should be ready to ioyne with his armie in Hungarie, for the furthering of his conquests there: And that the Persian King prosecuting the course of his victories, had ouerthrowne Cicala Bassa with his armie, and taken his sonne prisoner, almost slaine all his troupes, and entered into confederacie with Caracase, chiefe of the Rebels in Asia, a man of great power, who had following of him a great number of valiant men, all resolutely set downe for the troubling of the great Sultans estate.

Cassouia in danger to haue beene burnt by the Turkes.

About the same time the Gouernour of Cassouia (a great and strong citie in the vpper part of Hungarie) going forth with some good part of his garrison to appease the souldiers lying about in the countrey (but now vp in mutinie for their pay) and there spending some few dayes about this businesse, in shewing of them the danger of their insolencie, and persuading them by the euill successe and end of such like actions to returne againe vnto their duties; and they againe to the contrarie obstinatly vrging the payment of their pay, or else to haue leaue to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the other: and so the time passing, it fortuned that certaine Turks, then prisoners in Cassouia, encouraged by the absence of the Gouernour and of the garrison souldiers, to attempt the gaining of their libertie, brake their yrons, and slew their keepers, in hope so to haue escaped: but being in the doing thereof discouered, and so againe surprised before they could doe any further harme, and vpon torture examined, by what meanes they thought to haue escaped out of the citie, the wals thereof beeing kept with continuall sentinels: they confessed, That their purpose was, the same night to haue set fire vpon diuers places of the citie (so to haue drawne the people to the quenching thereof) and at the same time to haue slaine the sentinels vpon the walls, and so to haue made their escape: for which their so mischieuous a fact and purpose, they were some of them executed, and the rest againe committed to prison, and more straitly kept and looked vnto than before.

The citadell of Canisia by chance burnt.

Now as Cassouia had by the prouidence of God escaped so great an intended mischiefe, Canisia at the same time alone felt the euill hap by the Turkes entended both to Cassouia and Lippa: for a souldier of the garrison in the citadell there hauing through negligence or mishap cast fire into the pouder prouided for the store of the Castle, the pouder taking taking fire, blew vp the citadell, the towers, the houses, and walls; and to be briefe, made this poore place like vnto another Rome burnt by Nero. So that had any of the Christian forces been then neere vnto the place, it had been an eatie matter to haue woon the same, as well for the small resistance that was therein to haue been found in so great an astonishment of the men, and destruction of the place. But such accidents haue no certaine houres limited to their beginnings, nor assurance of their comming, so that they oftentimes chance, without any man to make vse of them, and againe flie away, when men make their greatest preparations to obtaine them.

At the same time the Turks of Buda sent two hundred of the souldiers of their garrison to fetch in forrage a little from Pesth, who as they were in the doing thereof too presumptuous, so were they well punished for their pride: For the Christians in Pesth having discouered them in this action, sallied out vpon them and charged them; against whom they for a while right valiantly defended themselues, but at length oppressed with number, and ouerthrowne, they were most of them slaine, and the rest taken prisoners: Wherewith the Bassa of Buda was so much offended, that in reuenge thereof, he in his rage threatened with fire and sword to do what harme he might vnto the Christians. But as the common prouerbe saith, Men warned are halfe armed; and enemies threats bring this comfort with them, That in receiuing of the threatned harmes, we are in hope to be thereof reuenged, as therefore before prouided.

Vnto these wofull troubles of Hungarie, proceeding as well from the insolencies of the Christian souldiers themselues, as from the furie of the Turkes, who were their antient and mortall enemies, were ioyned the like or rather worse calamities in Transyluania, extreame famine and want of all things sore raging in both countries; so that hardly hath any miserie or extreamitie beene seene or read of, euen in Countries by the iust and heauie iudgements of the Almightie God appointed to destruction, which were not in those two Countries to bee found, and of many felt. For remedie whereof, George Bassa the Emperours Lieutenant in Transyluania, had there done what hee might for the appeasing of the tumults and troubles of that Prouince, and now of late brought the same into some good tearmes, as was thought, and as is before declared. Howbeit, that in proofe it fell out farre otherwise, and that the more he therein laboured, the farther hee was off from his intent and purpose: for the Nobilitie of that Prouince, who were generally enclined vnto rebellion, and detesting the Germanes, together with their gouernement, reiected the decrees and orders which were agreed vpon in their late meeting together for the concluding of peace; insomuch, that assisted by the Turkes, they had taken certaine Castles and strong places in that Prouince: and the better to support their rebellion and insolencie, they had appointed a certaine place to meet at, where the Turkes and they might conferre together of the meanes which they intended for the effecting of their designes. Whereof Bassa hauing by secret meanes got vnderstanding, to remedie this pretended mischiefe, hee sent away a great number of Haiduckes, to lye in wait to surprise them vpon the way. Which men, who were skilfull in the passages of the Countrey, fayled not in this action, but lay close in ambush, verie conueniently for the surprising of their enemies: who proceeding in their intended purpose, and thinking of nothing lesse than of that which was entended against them, were suddenly, before they were aware, Turks and Transyluanians, altogether surprised and slaine. Which exploit beeing performed, these Haiduckes and other souldiers destitute of their pay, and enraged with furie, fell vpon the Prouince, vsing therein all hostilitie, as if they had beene mortall enemies vnto it; punishing the guiltlesse for the guiltie, and seising vpon all mens goods in common, to pay themselues that which was by some few in priuat kept from them. All the whole Prouince was subiect vnto the rage and furie of those and other such merciless men of warre, who without any remorse at all indifferently slew and massacred all of them that came in their way; but especially the poore and weake innocent people, who called vpon the Almighty God for remedy and redresse of these euils which they sustained, and cried out vnto him for reuenge of their so great and cruell wrongs. The high waies were euerie where so full of theeues, that no man could trauell from place to place, but that hee was in great danger to be set vpon, and spoiled. For the Haiducks (being men that liue altogether by prey, and roaming vp and downe the Countrey) made good prise and bootie of whatsoeuer came

The rebels in Transyluania surprised and slaine.

The miserable estate of Transyluania.

A came in their way, sparing neither Turkes nor Christians: insomuch, that they hearing, how that the Zeeclers with a good conuoy were bringing a number of waggons laden with victuals, and a great many of Oxen and other cattell to Claudionople, although they were of the same partie, beleefe, and Nation, yet they lay in wait for them to surprise them: against whome the Zeeclers seeking to defend themselues, were by them cruelly massacred, and their waggons, with their Beeues and other cattell, all carried quite away. But what should wee say? Hunger breaketh euen the stone walls, and forceth men vnto all extremities: and now the famine in that Prouince was such, as that the people were for the most part glad to liue by feeding vpon the roots of hearbs and weeds, and such other vnwholsome things, whereof great mortalitie afterward ensued amongst them: Which was the

B cause that Herwat, Captaine of these Haiduckes, beeing reproued for the outrages by them committed, and charged to take order, that no more such like should afterward bee done, answered, That it was not possible to keepe souldiers in any order amiddest the extreamitie of famine; for that the bellie was an inexorable vsurer, which tooke pittie vpon nothing, but with great rage exacting that which it thought due for the nourishment of it selfe.

Two of the Turkes spyes of Buda taken.

Amidest these troubles of Transyluania and Hungarie, there were two of the Turkes spyes of Buda discouered and taken; who at Vienna, had obserued all the actions and proceedings of the Christians, and to the vttermost of their power had informed themselues of their designes, as also of their preparations and forces to bee raised and

C leuied for this yeares warres: of which two spyes, the one was empayled, and the other kept in close and straight prison, vntill that further matter might be drawne out from him.

The forces of the Christians were now beginning to gather themselues together and to make an head in Hungarie; a rife report at that time going, That they would forthwith take the field: whereof the Bassa of Buda vnderstanding, and desirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardnesse (whereof hee doubted the effects) thought it best to betake himselfe to his old and cunning practise, for the treatie and concluding of a peace with the Christians, whereof hee now made shew himselfe, together with the rest of the Turkes, to bee verie desirous: so by putting the Christians in hope thereof,

D to make them the more remisse and negligent in their doings, and to gaine time of them, vntill that the Turkes great armie (then in preparing) might bee brought downe into Hungarie. To which purpose hee in most friendly manner thus writ vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium.

The Letters of the Bassa of Buda to the Gouernour of Strigonium.

Wee know right well (Noble Gouernour) that you are not ignorant, how that your brother the Gouernour of Strigonium before you, hath most earnestly embraced the negotiation of peace, in such sort, as that wee cannot so much yeeld vnto our ordinarie quarrels and dissentions, but that wee must giue you to vnderstand the causes which haue crossed and hindered the concluding of so great a good the last yeare now passed. The first let came by reason of the time, chosen

E too late to bee employed in that treatie for peace, when as now both the armies were alreadie on foot, and euen in readinesse to ioyne battell, and could not bee then stayed by that entreatie, nor bee sent backe againe without some exploit doing: Each part had resolued vpon their proper designes, and euen chosen their ground for battell, and were then hardly to bee turned from that wherevpon they were before resolued. And albeit, that during this last Winter, the treatie for the peace was againe begun, and that the men of warre on both sides in hope thereof, rested vnarmed, and free from all hostilitie; a most fit time to haue begun and ended this treatie of peace, which hath beene so much wished for of our Soueraigne Emperour, desired of his subiects, and requested by those of your Emperours, with whome yee dread Soueraigne would confirme and contract a firme and continuall peace: yet for all that, since the departure of the Gouernour from

F Strigonium, wee see three moneths to haue beene passed, without any Letters at all, or message by word of mouth brought vnto vs concerning this matter; so that wee haue not any thing whereof to certifie our Soueraigne Emperour. And forasmuch as the course of time hath brought these two contrarie armies euen vnto the point of battell, and that they are marching one of them to

to encounter with the other, and so to enter into the lists of honour, wee haue thought good before to de- G sire to know of you what we are to expect concerning the peace. Wee therefore requeſt you as our verie good brother and friend, in what wee may to stay the comming of our armies into this Kingdome, and to attend to that which may produce the concluſion of this treatie, beeing on our part most readie to lend both our ... and desire to whatsoeuer shall be iuſt and meet in this treatie, and neceſſarie for the common good beſeeching you to beleeue vs in this buſineſſe, and not to doubt of our good will, more affected s. your good, than is yours to our welfare: whereof wee in good time aduertiſe you, for that our armie which is now before Belgrade, beeing once arriued heere, and marching in field wee cannot poſſibly cauſe it to returne without ſomething doing, conſidering the great harmes, which vnder the aſſurance of your faith giuen, wee haue receiued from your people during the time of the truce, which they haue many wayes violated. Which their euill dealing hath greatly incenced vs againſt your men in captiuitie with vs, and cauſed our ſouldiers to ſhew great rigour againſt their ſlaues: wee H therefore attend your anſwere, and the returne of your brother, to the end wee may together reſolue according vnto reaſon and equitie, of that which ſhall bee needfull to bee done for the common good and welfare.

Now for all this faire gloſing, it was no hard matter to gheſſe at the Baſſaes ſecret meaning: for how deſireus ſoeuer hee ſeemed to bee of peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet neuertheleſſe true it is, that during the time of all theſe faire ſhewes, the Turkes hauing aſſembled their garriſons on all ſides, had by night ſurpriſed the caſtle of Simnin vpon the Chriſtians, ſlaine part of the ſouldiers therein, carried away the reſt priſoners, and I moſt cruelly afterwards burnt the place: So manifeſting by their foule deeds the euill meaning of their faire and deceitfull words. But now leauing the Baſſa for a while vnto his craftie deuices, and paſſing ouer many ſmall skirmiſhes which happened in Hungarie and Tranſyluania, as not beſeeming the grauitie of an Hiſtorie, let vs now out of Europe looke ouer into Aſia, to ſee how the Great Turkes affaires there in the meane time went.

The rebellion in Aſia was by the comming ouer of Zellaly and his followers for a time ſomewhat weakened, but not ſuppreſſed, that peſtilent humour of diſloyaltie hauing before infected the mindes of ſo many, as that in ſhort time after the Rebels were much ſtronger and the rebellion much more dangerous than before: for the appeaſing and repreſſing I whereof, Cicala Baſſa the old renegate, and a man of great experience and ſeruice, was as Generall ſent ouer with a great armie into Aſia, where hee needed not long to ſeeke for his enemies, they being as ready as he either to giue or to accept of battell: So that for men ſo on both ſides reſolued, it was no hard matter to bring them to the triall of battell: which they with like deſire and equall hope ioyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Baſſa fighting for his honour, and the Rebell for his life. Howbeit, that at length the Baſſa after much bloudſhed and a great number on both ſides ſlain, being put to to the worſe, fled with his armie altogether diſordered, and in rout, hauing in that ſo dangerous a confuſion of his people much adoe to ſaue himſelfe. With which ſo ſhamefull an ouerthrow giuen him by the Rebell, the Baſſa who was more aſhamed than diſcouraged, againe repaired his ar- L mie, ioyning thereunto great and mightie ſupplies, and ſo ſtrengthened, came now againe the ſecond time to reuenge himſelfe of the great diſhonour which he had before receiued, and vtterly to ſuppreſſe the Rebels: who now finding themſelues too weake to encounter with ſo great and mightie a power, wiſely betime retired, praying aide of the Perſian King, who ſent vnto them his owne ſonne with a great armie of good and valiant ſouldiers; which might haue giuen the Baſſa cauſe enough to haue ſtayed his haſte, and to haue beene well aduiſed how hee ioyned battell with ſuch deſperate and reſolute enemies, and now backt with ſuch ſtrong ſupplyes: But hee being blinded with the furie of his former loſſe, and too much deſirous to be thereof reuenged, with more haſt than good ſpeed came on, and ioyned battell with theſe his enemies, now in readineſſe and well prouided to receiue him. The two armies M were in number equall, but the Rebels of the two more reſolute and carefull of themſelues and of their welfare, as they which had repoſed all their hope and confidence in their owne armes and valour, ſo that the battell was with great ſtoutneſs and furie begun both on the one

A one ſide and on the other: in the beginning whereof the Turks right furiouſly charged the rebels, and ſeemed ſomewhat to preuaile vpon them, vntill that the Perſian Kings ſonne with certaine troupes of his moſt braue horſemen charging them in the rereward, and ſome other of the Rebels with like furie aſſailing them vpon their flankes, their whole armie was ſo diſordered, that Cicala doing what he could to haue put his men againe in order, and ſo to haue reſtored the battell, nothing therein preuailed, but was glad together with the reſt of his armie, now all in rout, to betake himſelfe to flight. In this battell were fortie thouſand men on the one ſide and the other ſlaine, whereof thirtie thouſand were of the Baſſaes armie, and the reſt of the Rebels; who by this their ſo great a victorie, gained no leſſe honour and reputation, than had the old Baſſa got of contempt and diſgrace. The Perſian King alſo after this B diſcomfiture of the Turkes, continuing his conqueſts, tooke in the Countrey of Situan (a matter of great importance) beeing now deſtitute of all reliefe by the ouerthrow of Cicala Baſſa, who, had he preuailed againſt the Rebels, ſhould haue marched thither againſt the Perſian King, to haue ſtayed the courſe of his victories: who now victorious and out of feare, made head toward Aruſta, a very great and ſtrong towne, neere whereunto the riuer Tygris diſchargeth it ſelfe into the great riuer Euphrates, which citie hee at laſt woon, with all the places and Countries thereunto adioyning; and hath ſince as a moſt happy and victorious Prince againe recouered from the Turkes whatſoeuer they had ſince the time of Sultan Solyman by force of armes taken from the Perſian Kings his predeceſſours, two or three ſtrong places onely excepted. Of which moſt notable warres betwixt theſe two of the moſt C mightie Eaſterne Princes, viz. the great Turke and the Perſian King, I can rather wiſh than hope to bee better enformed, and that, not ſo much for curioſitie (although that the knowledge of ſuch matters yeeld vnto ſuch as bee deſirous thereof much pleaſure, with no leſſe contentment) as for that they (though farre off) in ſome ſort much concerne the good and quiet of the Chriſtian Commonweale, the Perſian warres being the onely meanes whereby the furie of the Great Turkiſh Sultan hath beene, and yet is, for a time auerted from the Chriſtians in Europe vpon the Perſians in Aſia: as it is greatly to be feared, that ſome one or other (if not moe) of the Chriſtian Princes neereſt vnto him, ſhall to their great coſt and harme feele, ſo ſoone as theſe two great Mahometane Princes ſhall bee at peace betweene themſelues. But leaue wee the Baſſa a while to grieue at his ouerthrowes, and the Perſian D King to triumph of theſe victories, and ſee what the Great Sultan himſelfe in the meane time doth.

Cicala Baſſa ouerthrowne.

The ſucceſſe of the Perſian King.

This young Prince Achmat, now one of the greateſt Monarches of the World, had not many moneths raigned, but that hee fell ſicke of the ſmall pox, wherewith hee hauing a groſſe and full bodie, was ſo foulely tormented for the ſpace of foureteene daies, that often-times fainting, it was generally thought hee would thereof haue died: yea, diuers of the great Baſſaes were in ſpeech concerning his younger brother to bee taken out of the Seraglio to ſucceed him: which was thought would haue coſt the younger brother his life, after that the Sultan his elder brother was againe recouered, as no doubt it had, but that hee was the onely heire that was then left of the Othoman Familie, if that his brother the Sultan E ſhould haue fayled. But hee againe recouered of his foule and childiſh diſeaſe, to ſhew vnto the Ianizaries and others (who doubted thereof) that hee was ſo recouered, proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe, moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and in great ſtate and magnificence rid vp and downe through moſt of the chiefe ſtreets of the Imperiall Citie, the people (as their accuſtomed manner is) in euery place as hee went reioycing to ſee him, and proſecuting him with their moſt ioyfull acclamations, wiſhing vnto him a moſt long and happie raigne: Neither is it to be maruelled, ſeeing that the Almightie God hath euen in the faces and countenances of Princes engrauen ſome reſemblance of his owne, if they become reſpectuous and admirable in the eyes and ſight of the common people, who cannot but honour them with their voices, whome God hath bleſſed with his power, and other his extraordinarie worldF ly bleſſings.

Sultan Achmat ſick of the ſmall pox.

This young Prince ſo recouered of his ſickneſſe, and hauing ſhewed himſelfe vnto his ſubiects, began foorthwith to giue himſelfe according vnto the heat of his youthfull ſpirit) immoderately vnto the pleaſures of the field, and violent exerciſes; beeing in their moderate vſe wholeſome, but in them hurtfull, but eſpecially vpon the new recouerie of his late ſickneſſe, the griefes whereof came in haſte, but were to leaue him at leiſure. Whereupon two of his Baſſaes carefull of his health, were ſo bold, as out of their loue to reproue him for ſuch his violent and immoderat exerciſes (the day not beeing long enough for them) and by effectuall reaſons to diſſuade him from the ſame. But ſo farre off was hee from hearkening vnto their wholeſome perſuaſions, as that to the contrarie hee therwith inraged, thruſt them both out of their places. So dangerous a thing it is, euen in zeale and loue to preſume to controll great Princes in their moſt vaine pleaſures; others in the meane time not louing them at all, but onely for their owne profit attending vpon their idle appetites, enjoying the preferments due vnto their more faithfull and loyall ſubiects, and yet ſecretly in themſelues ſmiling at the vanitie of ſuch as by whom they be ſo vnworthily honoured and promoted.

But as in the immoderat vſe of all things there is a facietie which breedeth [illegible]ing and diſtaſte of them (pleaſures being not by any meanes more commended, than by [illegible]nouel. ties and ſeldome vſe:) ſo this young Sultan Achmat hauing glutted himſelfe with his pleaſures, began now to caſt his eyes vpon his other more neceſſarie affaires of State, but eſpecially vpon his warres both with the Chriſtian Emperour and the Mahometane Perſian King. Now hee was not ignorant of the great valour and ſufficiencie of Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, for the mannaging of his warres in Hungarie, wherein he had of long time beene exerciſed, and ſo therein beſt experienced. This old Captaine pleaſed him beſt, whome as an old, expert, and politicke Generall, hee reſolued to continue in his charge as Lieutenant Generall of his warres in Hungarie, and by the continuation of him in ſo great and honourable a place, to binde him to all loyall ſeruices in thoſe warres, euen to the vttermoſt of his power. This Great Baſſa was then at Belgrade, vpon the frontier of his gouernment in doubtfull ſuſpence expecting the reſolution of his Prince concerning this buſineſſe, and yet in hope longing after a ſecond charge: Whoſe longing deſire Achmat quickely ſatisfied, by ſending vnto him both a commiſſion for the continuation of his charge and dignitie, and certaine honourable Preſents in token of his extraordinarie fauour toward him; which were a Generals Enſigne, with an Hungarian Mace of pure gold. Now whether theſe Preſents, joyned vnto the continuation of his charge, were welcome vnto him, or not, ambitious mindes (ſuch as was his) can eaſily tell: and hee to ſhew his contentment therewith, gaue thereof good teſtimonie by the publique actions of joy, cauſing all the great Ordnance of the place in thundering wiſe to be oftentimes diſcharged, and the Trumpets and Drummes to be moſt joyfully ſounded.

In the meane time newes was brought vnto Conſtantinople, how that the Perſian king hauing muſtered his men, was in the field with aboue an hundred thouſand good ſouldiers, and that Bagages Baſſa, one of the great Rebels in Aſia, had confederated himſelfe with him, to the further troubling of the Turkes eſtate. Whereupon Achmat, although hee had before giuen order vnto Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa his Lieutenant in Hungarie, for the beſieging and taking of Veradinum, a ſtrong Citie in the vpper Hungarie; now by a meſſenger ſent in haſte, commaunded the ſame Baſſa, all other buſineſſes ſet apart, with all the power that hee could make, forthwith to returne to Conſtantinople, there with him and the reſt of the Baſſaes to conſult and reſolue vpon the moſt neceſſarie warre, and of the readieſt meanes for the continuing of the ſame. For albeit that the Turkes were moſt deſirous to haue warres with the Chriſtians, and ſo (if it were poſſible) to haue conquered the remainders of Hungarie; yet the danger of the Perſian warres and of the rebellion in Aſia dayly more and more encreaſing, ſuffered them not wholly to attend vnto the warres againſt the Chriſtians in Hungarie, but drew them now into a doubtfull conſultation, which way firſt to turne their forces. But the Baſſa being come to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seignior tooke the paines and did him the honour to come vnto his houſe; whither the Counſell for the State beeing aſſembled, it was there moſt proudly reſolued vpon, euen foorthwith at one and the ſelfe ſame time with equall forces to make warre both vpon the Chriſtian Emperour in Hungarie, and the Perſian King in Aſia, accounting themſelues ſtrong enough to ſubdue and bring vnder foot both the one and the other, no power vpon earth beeing in their proud conceit of themſelues able to encounter or withſtand theirs. So for the mannaging of theſe warres, and of their ſo proud a reſolution to be performed in ſo remote Haſſan Baſſa ſent for to come to Conſtantinople.

A remote parts of the world, Haſſan Baſſa was continued in his charge, as General of the armie in Hungarie; and Cicala Baſſa was appointed to haue the command of the armie to be ſent againſt the Perſian: Two moſt expert Captaines, being to fight againſt their hereditarie enemies; Haſſan againſt the Chriſtians, and Cicala againſt the Perſians, by whom he had not long before bin euil vſed. An ordinarie policie of the Othoman Emperors, not to commit the charge of their armies againſt the Chriſtians, vnto Renegats; for feare leſt they, touched with ſome remorſe of conſcience, might betray the ſame, or otherwiſe deale vnfaithfully in their charge: but ſtill to employ them againſt the Perſians, of whom they haue no further knowledge, but as of their enemies in the field. But Cicala Baſſa well acquainted both with the difficultie and the danger of the Perſian war, (the ſcarres whereof he yet bare about with him) made ſhew

And ſo receiuing the Generals Enſigne, with the other markes and cogniſances of his honour, cauſing the drums to be ſtrucken vp, and the trumpets to be joyfully ſounded, he cheerefully prepared himſelfe for that his ſo great an expedition; expecting but the comming of his ſonne, who at the requeſt of the Venetians was gon forth with a

Amiddeſt which the Turks ſo great deſignes, the Tartar Cham, bound for his pay to ſerue the Great Turke in his warres againſt the Chriſtians; by his Embaſſadour excuſed himſelfe vnto the Great Sultan, for that he could not himſelfe in perſon come this yeare with his forces into Hungarie, by reaſon that he was otherwiſe neceſſarily buſied with the moſt vrgent affaires of his owne Eſtate: yet promiſing withall, in ſtead of himſelfe, to ſend his ſonne with a good power of men. Now whereas many men maruell, why the Tartar Cham, being ſo great a Prince, and not much in danger vnto the Turke (being ſeparated from him by the Blacke or Euxine ſea) ſhould be ſtill ſo readie at the Turkes call, to doe him ſeruice in his warres: The cauſes thereof are diuers, and thoſe not far to ſeeke. But this his excuſe for not comming himſelfe this yeare into Hungarie, being by the Great Sultan accepted of, Haſſan Baſſa reſolued vpon his expedition for Hungarie, made great preparation for the good ſucceſſe of the warre there, gaue great hope thereof vnto the Great Sultan, and cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed Lieutenant Generall of all the Great Sultans

For why, the Turkes doe account him the beſt and moſt zealous man, which can do the Chriſtians moſt harme. And ſo with theſe ſo great acclamations of joy and honour, Haſſan the great Baſſa ſet forward with his armie from Conſtantinople toward Hungarie.

The Chriſtian Emperor not ignorant of all theſe the Turks great preparations and haughty deſignes, ſought by all meanes how to reſiſt them, ſparing nothing that might any way ſerue or ſtand him in ſtead to that purpoſe. Experience had aſſured him of the Popes readineſſe in

F contributing to this action, what in his power was; hauing before receiued ſo many teſtimonies of his good will. Which cauſed him now to diſpatch alſo his brother Maximilian the Archduke, a good and a deuout Prince, vnto him, with expreſſe charge in the Emperors name to yeeld all ſubmiſſion vnto his Holineſſe, to mooue him to relieue the wofull eſtate of his diſtreſſed affaires. Maximilian ſetting forward about this buſineſſe, arriued at Venice, where he

he was by that State right honorably entertained. From Venice he trauelling towards Rome, G and with a great retinue approching the citie, was there met by a great number of Noblemen with their followers, sent from the Pope, and so by them with great honour was brought into the Vaticane Palace, to the intent that so he might the oftener and with more ease haue accesse vnto the Pope, who then lay there sicke of the gout. The next day he being brought vnto the Popes presence, and after vsual reuerence done, hauing audience giuen him, in the presence of all the Cardinals he began to deliuer vnto him the causes of his comming; which (as he said) were two: First, to put his Holinesse in remembrance of the manifest perill and danger which hung ouer the heads of the Christians in generall, from the Turke, but especially ouer them of Italie, being so neere vnto the Turkish Empire, and a great gap laid open for the Turks thereinto to enter, by the way of Canisia, the key of Stiria. And then in the Emperors H behalfe to requeste him to stretch forth his helping hand against this his mortal e[illegible] who was now drawing all his power together into one head, to destroy him: hauing cer[illegible]nderstanding of the great preparation by him made throughout all his dominions, to thrust him out of his, if in these extremeties he were not relieued by such Princes as could not in the end themselues auoid the last violences of these harmes, whereof he felt the first assaults.
Which his Holinesse considering in the zeale of his deuotion, and by the encreasing of the danger, he was in hope to finde of it the like assistance in this his second need, that he had before receiued in his former affaires: the pretious balme of his deuout charitie being of greatet vertue than to serue but for one time, but being of sufficient power to serue for all ages, and all times of necessitie. And that therefore he besought his Holinesse to applie the same vpon the I present wound, seeing that without his helpe, he was more like to perish than to liue. Where-The Popes answer vnto the Emperours demands. unto the Pope answered, That his former actions alreadie passed spake enough for him in this action, to manifest his deuout meaning, so that it was needlesse for him to vse further words to expresse the same. That the great supplies both of men and money which he had sent forth for the good of the Christian commonweale, were the sure testimonies of his carefulnesse for the same. And albeit that these euill haps had so far preuailed in Hungarie, yet that he for his part nouertheless had still done what he might for the remedying of those so great euils.
And that now by the aduice of his honourable Counsellors there present, he had appointed an hundred and fiftie thousand crownes to be payd toward the maintenance of the Christian Armie in Hungarie this yeare; in hope to do more than that afterward for the Emperor in his K wars against the Turks: whom God had (as he said) suffered to preuaile vpon the Christians, not for any goodnesse that was in them, but for the chastising of the wickednesse of the Christians themselues.

Which summe of an hundred and fiftie thousand crownes was afterward according to a decree made by the Pope and Cardinals, leuied and payd of the tenths of the Clergie throughout all Italie. And so Maximilian the Archduke most magnificently entertained and feasted by the Pope, and by him rewarded with foure thousand crownes, hauing wel dispatched the businesse he came for, returned againe vnto the Emperor his brother.

But as the Christian Emperour was thus carefull about his prouisions for the withstanding of the Turks, they were not any whit behinde him in augmenting of their forces for the inua- L ding of him. And now the Tartars in great number being about to come vnto their aid into Valachia spoy-led by the Tartars. Hungarie, being denied passage by the Polonians, had turned head towards Valachia, with a purpose by force and strong hand to get that of these weake people, which the power of the stronger had embarred them of. And so presuming vpon their number, they entered into the same Prouince, which they all ouer rifled and spoiled at their pleasure. Where such of the countrey people as could escape their furie, fled into the townes, leauing their goods behinde them vnto their mercilesse rage, not with any thing to be satisfied. Rodolph the Vayuod himselfe as a man with furie dismaied, fled to Cronstat to George Bassa: where he considering the danger he was now in, and that he was still to expect the like so often as the Tartars were for Rodolph the Vayod submitteth himself & his countrey to the Emperours protection. the seruice of the Turke to come into Hungarie, before Bassa tooke a new oath of allegeance M vnto the Emperor, solemnly protesting to die and liue in his seruice; necessitie now enforcing him to acknowledge his dutie, and to seeke for the remedie of his harmes, which he had before oftentimes most vnkindly reiected. Vpon which his so humble submission, Bassa receiued him and his countrey into his protection.

In

A In the meane time two traitours were brought to Claudinople, who hauing by wonderfull craft surprised a strong castle belonging vnto a certain great Ladie a widow, neere vnto a burrough called Carasebe, and rifled and sacked the same, traiterously afterward sold it vnto the Turks, to the great hurt of the Emperors subiects neere vnto the place, and the no lesse aduan-tage of the Turks. Whereof the Haiducks hauing gotten vnderstanding, and cunning in such matters, vpon the sudden surprised the Turks by the way as they were comming to haue taken possession of the place: who seeing themselues too weake to withstand their enemies, and out of hope to saue themselues by flight, were there as men dismaied and appointed to the slaughter, most of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the rest taken prisoners. The two Traitors being according to their deserts, for their shametull trecherie, most cruelly put to death, B to the terror of others.

The Turks surprised by the Haiducks.

The Haiducks hauing no houses but the fields, nor other trade but their armes, spoiled of the one by the Turks, and armed with the other by necessitie, are alwaies in readinesse for seruice. In hope of profit, it is to them a pleasure to passe ouer the mountaines of yce, to trauell through the stormes of thunder and lightening, to swimme ouer the deepe riuers, and to thrust themselues into a thousand dangers, which as it is no commendable kinde of life, so is the practise of it vniust. For as in this, so in other their actions, they spare neither friend nor foe, all that comes in their way being subiect, and as it were appointed to their furie: but especially when they want their pay, which affoordeth vnto them a thousand excuses, for the rob-C bing and spoiling of all men without respect. With which manner of furie they were euen at this time enraged for want of their pay, in such sort, as that if their right hands spoyled the Turks, their left hands robbed the Christians: as vpon one and the selfe same day they tooke from the Turks of Agria a number of beasts and cattel, and rifled diuers villages of the Christians. And not content with these outrages, meeting with an hundred, or six score waggons, laded with great store of victuals, going toward Alba-Iulia, conducted by the Zeclers, set vp-on them, slew them that driue them, and carried away the waggons with them. But these wrongs by Christians done vnto Christians, euen the mortall enemies of the Christians, the Turks themselues reuenged. For the Turks of Temeswar hauing been abroad toward Lippa, and found good store of bootie, meeting with these sharkers, were by them charged, not so D much for that they were their enemies, or for the zeale of Christianitie, or for the desire of honour, as for to haue had from them their prey and bootie. But the Turks being in number twice as many as they, and withall wel acquainted with such businesse, were not so easily spoiled; but knowing their owne strength, with their number, oppressed their enemies, most of whom they slew, and tooke the rest prisoners. God being as just in his punishments, as he is in works powerfull, punishing the wicked by the weapons of others as wicked, or rather worse than they.

The Turkes in their hearts meaning warre make shew as if they were desirous of peace.

The Turks in the meane time whilest things thus passed, began againe to fall to their old practise, for the soliciting of a peace: but such fantasies were too stale and common for them any more to deceiue the Christians with: howbeit that they yet gaue some eare thereunto, to discouer in their policie the commodities and inconueniences of the peace by them in shew E offered, with a thousand protestations in their words, but farre differing from their thoughts and deeds: who during the time of the parley, laboured in what they might to benefit themselues, and to hurt vs. For euen in that same verie time they fortified their townes and castles with men and victuals, but especially the citie of Buda, whereinto by a conuoy of three thousand Turks come from Belgrade, they put an exceeding quantitie of all sort of necessarie pro-uision, sufficient to serue the same for an whole yeare. Besides that, it was certainly knowne by certaine Turks taken prisoners and brought to Posconium, that all this parley and treatie of peace was but of purpose feigned to put the Christians in security; for that the Bassa of Buda, who was the chiefe publisher of the same, had no such commission from the Great Sultan for the concluding of any peace in the absence of the Visier Bassa, vnto whom the Graund Seignio F our had giuen charge, not to make any peace with the Emperour, but vpon condition; That hee should first deliuer vnto him thu Citie of Strigonium: which if hee would not yeeld, that then he should besiege it, and by force take it from him; and after the winning thereof to refuse all other treatie of peace, it being the onely cause for which the Turke desired peace. Of all which their double dealing and craftie designes the Emperour vnderstanding, and whole-ly

ly resolued for war, presently sent Countie Sulizo with commission to Vienna, and appointed George Batta Lieutenant Generall of his Armie in Hungarie; aduising them carefully to looke to their charge, and not too much to trust vnto the glosing and flattering speeches of the Turks.

The castle of Reoum surprised by the Haiduckes.

The Haiduckes in the meane time alwaies in armes, as hauing no other inheritance whereon to liue, ceased not still to looke abroad, to finde that was neuer lost. Now it fortuned them in roaming aboute toward Belgrade, to light vpon Reouin a strong and faire castle of the Turks, wherein eight hundred of the Turks souldiers and other of their countrey people had their abode, together with the greatest part of their substance. In the strength of which castle the Turks trusting, and there lying in securitie, without further care of their safetie, were vpon the sudden before they were aware, by these aduenturous men surprised, who hasting thrusting one another forward, at length carried the place, slew the greatest part of them, and taking the rest prisoners, with a great and rich bootie returned to Lippa. The exploit they of the garison of Canisia attempted vpon the castle and burrough of Sambac, which they tooke and spoiled, and afterwards set it on fire: The flame whereof serued for a signal vnto the troupes of Countie Serin, which passing that way, and lighting vpon the Turks ouerloded with the spoiles they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and so recouered from them the bootie.

Petrinia in danger to haue been betrayed vnto the Turkes.

About this time, certaine of the garison souldiers of Petrinia, hauing secretly conspired with the Turkes (by whom they were before corrupted) to deliuer vnto them that strong castle: and being about to haue betrayed the same by a Mine which they were in making vnder a stable neere vnto a store-house wherein the pouder for the store of the castle lay, with a purpose by firing of the same, to haue giuen the Turkes enterance by the ruines thereof, who lay close hidden in a wood neere vnto the place; it fortuned this their wicked purpose to be perceiued by certaine offendors then kept prisoners in the same stable neere vnto the Mine: who hauing discouered the Traitours whole purpose, and in feare to be burned or blowne vp by the furie of the Mine so neere vnto them, discouered the same vnto the Gaoler, who made the Gouernour therewith acquainted; by whose commandement they were forthwith apprehended, and being conuicted of their so foule a treason, were with exemplarie punishment executed.

Now as the Turkes had oftentimes made shew as if they had beene desirous of peace, so ceased they not yet with great earnestnesse to solicit the same: so that the Emperour, although he knew it to be a thing rather to be wished than hoped for, yet lest he should seeme careless of the common quiet of his subiects and people, and to refuse so great a good so oftentimes offered him; now once againe appointed certaine personages of great place and authoritie to attend the propositions of peace to be on the Turks behalfe propounded. Of which Commissioners, Cæsar Gallen Sheriffe of Strigonium, an Italian, and a man of great experience in matters of State, was one. Whom the Gouernour of Strigonium had of purpose sent to Pesth, to consider of some good meanes for the concluding of the peace, whereof he himselfe in person had layd the first foundation; and vnderstood the Turks demands and pretensions, not much differing from those which they had many times before demanded. Whereof the first was, That the Emperour should for the time to come well and truly pay vnto the Great Sultan and his successors, all such tribute as he was wont to pay vnto the Turkish Emperors his predecessors, during the time of his leagues with them, and that without any demand to be thereof made. The second, That the Emperour should alwaies haue his Embassadour Lieger at the Great Sultans Court, with honourable Presents, there to solicit the continuation of his loue and friendship toward the Emperour his Master. The third, That the Emperour should deliuer vnto the Turkes all the townes and castles which he had taken from them either by force or by surprise, during the time of this warre, together with the countries of Transyluania and Valachia. Vpon which demands granted, they promised to send a messenger vnto the Great Sultan, in their names to entreat him to surrender Canisia vnto the Emperor, but not Agria, which (as they said) they might in no wise deliuer, except they were thereunto by force of armes constrained.

The insolent & vnreasonable demands of the Turkes for the concluding of a peace with the Christians.

The answer of the Emperours Commissioners vnto the Turkes proud demands.

Vnto which their so proud and vnreasonable demaunds the Commissioners for the Emperour answered, That the Emperour long before this time had made peace with Sultan Selym the

the second of that name, and with Sultan Amurath the third, this Sultan Achmat his predecessours. An assured peace, sworne vnto and confirmed by all the iust and solemne Oathes that could haue beene by any man desired: and for the more assurance thereof, into writing conceiued, and with the most authentique seales of their Maiesties confirmed: whereby both parties were most seuerely and straitly forbidden, one of them to attempt any thing against the other, or to encroach the one of them vpon the other, during the time of such their League: And if so bee that contrarie to the tenour thereof, either part should vndertake to surprise any place belonging to the other, and so become masters thereof, that vpon the least request of the partie so wronged, the places surprised should bee againe forthwith restored, as vsurped vpon, contrarie to the publique faith, and the vsurpers to bee seuerely for the same punished. And that yet the Turkes notwithstanding thrusting by heapes beyond the Barres of this so strong and holy a League, had violated and broken the same, by surprising a number of places both in the high and lower Countries of Hungarie, neuer giuing care vnto any speech or request that could bee made vnto them for the restitution thereof. And yet not so contented, had also taken a number of places from the Emperour in Sclauonia, betweene the riuers of Culpe and Vnna: Which places hee had oftentimes by as just right redemaunded, as they were by vniust forces vsurped, before the beginning of these warres. Demaunds esteemed just and reasonable euen by the Turkes themselues, and yet for all that altogether reiected by the great Sultans themselues: of which their so great iniustice the Emperour had oftentimes most justly complained, and so did euen at this day, at the feeling of such his hurts and harmes. And that the Emperour hauing by so many perfidious dealings made proofe of the vntrustinesse of the Grand Seigniour his predecessours, what assurance then can hee conceiue of his fidelitie? or vpon what foundation of faith can hee build the sure building of peace, so much desired of him? And yet if he might hope so much of the faith of another man, as he is assured of his owne just meaning, differing much from that of the Grand Seigniours, which hee knew to be neuer answerable vnto his; that he for his part could be well content to embrace the peace; prouided alwaies, That hee might haue Canisia and Agria deliuered vnto him. Or that if they would needs stil hold those places, that he might likewise in peace hold the places that he had before woon in that war, the reasons being on both sides alike. And that as concerning Transyluania, hee could not deliuer that without betraying of his owne right, and the welfare of that Prouince; hauing obtained the same as well by agreements and couenants betweene him and the sonne of the last Duke, Iohn, as by the free and voluntarie releasement which Sigismund Bathor, the last and immediat Prince thereof, had not long before made vnto him: for the defence of which his rights, hee had spent many men, and great summes of money, and all for the keeping of that Prouince by force of armes, which by so good right belonged vnto him. And that for Valachia he could be content to yeeld some part of his right vnto that Prouince, so that the Turke should cease from thenceforth to demand of him any yearly tribute, or that he should as of ordinary duty send his embassadors with yerely Presents to the Grand Seignior, not being able without need, to consent vnto such a needlesse seruitude: seeing that euery Prince ought to be at libertie, at his owne choice to send his Embassadors, and not at the appointement of another man.

Which answere of the Emperours Commissioners serued to no other purpose, but for the Turkes to laugh and sport at, how just and reasonable soeuer they were: and finding them so yeeld vnto their vnreasonable demaunds; or else threatening to [illegible] the Great Sultan thereof, who by force would take that from them, to [illegible] losse, which they refused to grant him by faire meanes, to their owne [illegible] treatie was for that time broken off, without any thing concluded [illegible] Gouernour of Strigonium to retire himselfe backe againe vnto [illegible] that, leauing Cæsar Gallen behind him, to entertaine it in such [illegible] of yet left: who afterwards seeing it almost desperate, made [illegible] taine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Buda, and hauing [illegible] them a promise to liue as friends with them of the [illegible] places which lay neere vnto that towne, hee retired [illegible] um also.

Shortly after whose departure, Iagenreuter Gouernour of Pesth, notwithstanding the late promises of the Turkes of Buda, for their liuing by him in peace and amitie; and the assured promise of Cæsar Gallen, at his last departure, for the speedy furnishing of the towne both with men and all things else necessarie for the defence thereof, which he ought with great assurance to haue expected: yet dismaied with the brute of the comming of Hassan Bassa the Turkes Generall with his great armie, and that by the strait commandement of the great Sultan, hee was to begin his conquests in Hungarie with the winning of Pesth; as a man afraid of his owne shadow, though good betime to prouide for himselfe: and vpon that resolution, hauing yet seene no enemie at all to force him, trussing vp his baggage, the fifth of September forsooke the towne, with fiue companies of footmen, and six troupes of horsemen to[o] ... wing him: a sufficient number to haue for a time defended the towne, and endured a si[ege] ... ecially in so strong a place, and so well prouided both of victuals and munition. All w[ith] ... his most cowardly Gouernor (but vnworthie that name) left together with his honor, for[sook] ... to his enemies: hauing yet before his departure out of the towne, caused the principal buildings thereof to be vndermined, and barrels of gunpouder to be laid vnder them, wherewith they were shortly after all ouerthrowne, and most part of the towne burnt. But being gone not past halfe a league from the place, hee met with foure hundred Haiduckes all well armed, whome the Gouernour of Strigonium had sent for the reliefe of Pesth, with a number of boats loaded with corne, munition, and other necessaries of all sorts, for the better assurance of the place, and the performing of the promise before to that end made by the Gouernour of Strigonium: which Hungarian Haiduckes meeting with these dismayed cowards vpon the way, thought it not best to goe any farther, as thinking themselues not able to doe that with their so small a number, which the other durst not to vndertake with their far greater: and so ioyning themselues with the other fearefull fugitiues, they with them returned to Strigonium, leauing their vessels and munitions vnto their enemies, who immediatly after seised vpon them.

Pesth most shamefully abandoned by the Christians.

Pesth taken by the Turkes.

The next day after, the mines hauing taken their effect, the Turks wondering to see so great and terrible a fire in Pesth, which still more and more encreased, there beeing none that went about to quench it, aduentured to come ouer the riuer from Buda, and to draw neere vnto the towne now all on a light fire. Which they finding abandoned and forsaken by the Christians, they with great diligence quenched, repaired the ruines of the towne, and so without any losse became masters of the same.

Iagenreuter for his cowardise worthily committed to prison.

Iagenreuter the cowardly late Gou[ernour] with his fearefull troupes in the meane time comming to Strigonium, and by the Gou[ernour] there examined of the causes of his flight, and of the so shamefull leauing of his charge; [not] being able to alledge no other cause or reason, but the great brute and report of the Visier Bassaes comming with his armie to besiege the towne, was therefore committed to prison, and there reserued to be afterward iustly punished for his disloyaltie and cowardise.

The Bassa of Buda excuseth himself for the taking of Pesth

The Bassa of Buda by the cowardise of the Gouernour thus possessed of Pesth, by letters excused himselfe vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium, for the taking thereof, the treatie of peace being not as yet quite broken off: alleadging for himselfe (as the truth was) That he had taken it as a place by the Christians vpon a vain feare forsaken, and desperatly set on fire, without any such cause giuen them so to doe by the Turkes, or on his behalfe. And further, offered vnto the Gouernour, if hee so pleased, to deale with him for the exchange of prisoners on both sides taken, offering to exchange one of them for another. And as for the concluding of the peace so oftentimes treated of, and euen yet in hand, that hee for his part was wonderfull desirous that it might bee fully concluded and ended, before the arriuall of Hassan the Visier Bassa with his armie in Hungarie: for that hee beeing once come, there would then be no time amidst the noise of so many weapons, and so many men of warre, to talke of peace.

Hassan Bassa commeth into Hungarie.

Hassan the Visier Bassa was now for all that alreadie entered into Hungarie, drawing after him a world of men, and was come towards Sexart, for the viewing of which armie the Gouernour of Pallantwar going foorth with an hundred horsemen, by euill hap chanced, before hee was aware, vpon the sudden to meet with fiue hundred Turkes, by the Bassa himselfe likewise sent forth to discouer the countrey, and the passages thereof: by whom he charged, and

A and with the multitude of his enemies oppressed, was himselfe taken prisoner, most of his men being in that conflict slaine, some few of them that were left aliue by speedie flight hardly escaping. Which euill hap on the Christians side, was forthwith recompenced with the better successe of the Countie Serin, who falling vpon three hundred Turkes neere vnto Sigeth, beeing in number scarce halfe so many as they, yet let vpon them with such courage, that giuing them no leisure to consider of the weaknesse of his forces, they were by them ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, before they were well aware of him.

But together with the time of the yeare, to come vnto the maine point of these present warres in Hungarie, the Turkes finding themselues out of hope by any capitulations or treaties of peace, to regaine the strong towne of Strigonium out of the hands of the Chri-

B stians, were now re[so]lued to employ the vttermost of their forces for the obtaining of the same; with a thou[sand] protestations, That if by force of armes and strong hand they should gaine the place, they would neuer more haue peace with the Christians. At which their vaine threats and speeches, the Christians before resolutely set downe for the defending of the place by them so much desired, and well acquainted with their great brags, could not but with scorne smile, as men nothing therewith dismaied, nor so to bee remoued. Neuertheless the Bassa constant in his resolution for the regaining Strigonium, with all his forces came the eighteenth day of September and layed siege vnto it. Now vnto this siege the Turkes, in hope of spoyle and booty, came flocking from all places, as it had beene to some great mart; and the fields in all the Countrey thereabout were couered and swarmed Strigonium besieged by the Turkes.

C with armes, men, horses, and tents. They encamped neere vnto Charles his hill, taking vp with their tents halfe a league of the Countrey round about: and at their first comming most brauely aduanced their Ensignes with their halfe Moones, the armes of their still encreasing Empire. Whom the besieged in this action imitated, brauely aduancing their Ensignes vpon their walls, as did the Turkes in the fields; and further brauing and prouoking them with a thousand thundering shot, discharged out of the Towne amongst them. All the walls round about the Towne, glistered with armes and flames of fire, out of which the deadly bullets flew carrying with them death and terrour into the middest of these new comers enemies, for their welcome. The Turkes neuertheless came still resolutely on, and as men prodigal of their liues euen in the middest of so many dangers, began to make their approches.

The Christians fall forth vpon the Turkes.

D Vpon whom the Christians with great courage sallied forth, to disturbe them in their works, and so for the space of certaine houres hauing had with them an hot and sharpe skirmish, without any great hurt receiued, retired againe into the towne, leauing vnto their enemies by that they had done, a good testimonie of their valour and resolution. The Turkes for all that lodged themselues, made their trenches, and so encamped before the mount of Saint Thomas, where by the placing of their cannon, they well declared their meaning for the battering of that fort.

E resolutely opposed himselfe, hauing neere vnto Strigonium cast vp a strong fort, well furnished with men and great artillerie, from which he greatly annoied the Turks with his great ordinance, and with the furie thereof enforced them to remoue farther off with their approaches his armie vpon the riuer of Danubius in the meane time lying betwixt the Isle of [Strigonium] and the old towne of the Rascians, to keep the enemy from entering either into the [new towne] or the other.

Countie Sultze Gouernour of the place also hauing taken a generall muster [of his men], and with comfortable and cheerefull speeches encouraged his souldiers [to fight] minde of their duetie, and of the honourableneesse of the action now in hand, for the maintenance of the Christian religion, for the seruice of the Emperour, of their owne liues: perswading them withall, not to put any trust [in] faith, or faire promises, considering that their weapons were euen [now] their Christian brethren, most perfidiously by them of late massacred [at the towne] of Alba Regalis: encouraging them also with the goodnesse of [their cause], nesse of their friends abroad for their reliefe, with the regard [of their wiues and children], ardise of their barbarous enemies, whose onely hope and [confidence is in them].

withall comforting them, that holding out but some few moneths, the very elements themselues and the time of the yeare, would as it were fight for them, and affoord them aid, their enemies being not able with their great armie, in the extremitie of Winter weather, without their irreparable losses to hold the field. And that as for himselfe, his honor together with his life, were so b[illegible]d vnto his graue and sepulchre, at the foot of the wals of that place, as that they could n[illegible]e from the same separated; hauing proposed the glory of the preseruation of that place, or e[illegible] of an honourable death, as the end of all his actions, and consummation of all his hopes. And that therefore he most earnestly besought them to follow his so honourable a purpose, in assisting him in that action, so much concerning their liues and honour, and wholly depending of their courage and resolution. And that for testimonie of his earnest desire to the furthering of this seruice, he was willing to depart with a good part of his substance and treasure, to be bestowed vpon them, amiddest these the trophies of his honour, [illegible]ing commanded them to haue certaine moneths pay payed before hand vnto them, whic[illegible] as accordingly done.

A notable sally of the Christians out of the fort of S. Thomas. The Christians falling into an ambush of the Turkes, lose one of their chiefe Commanders.

Now the Turkes hauing a purpose easily to begin the conquest of Strigonium by the taking of the strong fort of Saint Thomas, came the foure and twentieth day of September to assault and batter the same: vpon whome fiue hundred horsemen, and two thousand footmen sallying out of the fort, caused them, after a sharpe and bloudie conflict, and not without some losse on both sides, to retire backe againe, and to forsake the mount whereupon they were encamped. But in pursuing of them too farre, they fell into a great ambush, before by the Turkes for that purpose layed to entrap them; where betwixt them was fought a most sharpe and bloudie fight; the Turkes presuming vpon t[illegible] multitude, and the Christians standing vpon their valour and honour. Vntill that in fine, valour by number being oppressed, seuen hundred of the Turkes being slaine, the Christians were enforced to retire, hauing lost about an hundred of their men, and amongst them the valiant Countie Casimir of Holenloth, for whose bodie there was a notable fight betwixt the Christians and the Turkes; not much vnlike vnto that which the Poet Homer describeth, to haue beene fought betwixt the Trojanes and the Greekes, for the bodie of Patroclus. Howbeit that at length the Christians beeing ouercharged with the comming on of the whole armie of the Turks, were glad (as I said) to retire, and so to leaue the dead bodie of the Countie Casimir in the power of their mercilesse enemies; who as dogges which reuenge themselues vpon the stones which are cast at them, being not able to bite the hands of them that threw them; so did they vpon the bodie of this gentle Knight, by cu[illegible] off his nose and eares, and afterwards his head. But within some few dayes after, this b[illegible] so disfigured was againe deliuered vnto the Christians for a Turke of good account, who was about that time by them taken prisoner. At which time the Turkes seemed to bee verie desirous of peace, most earnestly requesting Countie Fredericke of Holenloth (the slaine Counties brother) not to be an hinderer thereof. Howbeit that this was but one of their old practises, depending still vpon vnreasonable conditions, whereof the yeelding vp of Strigonium was one of the chiefest, as the place by them most desired.

More than beastly cruelty exercised by the Turkes vpon the dead bodie of Countie Holenloth.

Hatwan most shamefully forsaken by the Christians.

But if this siege of the Turkes auailed them not against the place besieged, yet was it profitable for them against another place by them not attempted, which was the strong towne of Hatwan, more subiect vnto feare, without any danger, than was Strigonium vnto the bullets and batterie of the Turkes, with just cause of distrust. For the souldiers which lay there in garrison, terrified with the siege of Strigonium, and doubting lest the Turks leauing that siege, should come and besiege them, trussing vp their bag and baggage, the nineteenth of September abandoned the place, and carrying away with them the best of the great ordnance, lest the rest altogether with the place, and great store of prouision, vnto the enemie, not in hope of any such matter.

The bruit of the siege of Strigonium had called thither all the forces of both parties in Hungarie, and the Countries thereabouts, on the one side for the winning thereof, and on the other for the defence of the same. Amongst others, the Countie of Tambier, Gouernour of Lippa, was about to haue gone thither with certaine of his troupes to haue aided his General, for the preseruation of the place. But in the mean time Bethlin Habor, chiefe of the rebels in Transyluania

A Transyluania, assisted by Beckheres Bassa with foure thousand Turkes entered into the Prouince to haue made himselfe master thereof vnder the protection of the Turke. Whereof the Countie hauing got knowledge, resolued to goe and meet him, and to encounter him at the verie first enterance of him into the Prouince. This old Rebell knowing that George Bassa was by the Emperours appointment gone out of the Countrey with the best troupes of his horsemen, the greatest strength of the Prouince, came on in great securitie, thinking of nothing but of victorie, and of performing his entended exploit, without feare of any to let him: so that casting no further perill, hee was surprised by the Countie, before he was aware, and put to flight. Neither was the fight long betwixt men accustomed to vanquish, resolutely set downe, and well armed, against men dismayed, halfe naked, and surprised. In which conflict aboue a thousand of them beeing slaine, and a thousand of horses B of seruice taken, the rest fled; amongst whome Bethlin himselfe with his Bassa flying, were glad by swimming to saue themselues amiddest a thousand chances and dangers of their liues.

Succors sent to the rebell by the Bassa of Temeswar, defeated by the Countie Tambier, & the Bassa his Lieutenant slaine.

The Bassa of Temeswar aduertised of this ouerthrow by one of them that was fled from the same, presently hee sent forth his Lieutenant with a good number of men, to relieue the vanquished Turkes: Who by the way vnderstanding of the generall ouerthrow of them whome he was sent forth to relieue, as also of the strength of his enemies, and that he was come too late to the reliefe of his friends, retired as fast as he could with his men backe againe homeward toward Temeswar. But beeing in their retreat discouered, and hotly pur- C sued by these men imbrued with the bloud of their enemies, and yet breathing with victorie, they were by them ouertaken euen almost at the gates of their Citie, and there (as men before ouercome with feare, and ouerwhelmed with despaire) cut in pieces, without any fight or resistance by them made, beseeming men of their sort; the Lieutenant himselfe beeing there slaine also.

After which exploits done, the Countie turning towards Iula, chanced to light vpon certaine companies of Turkes loaded with bootie, which they had got in roaming abroad into the Countrey thereabout, whome he pursued euen vnto the gates of the towne, which they found shut against them; for that they within the towne seeing the Christians euen at the heeles of their companions, had shut their gates, neither durst now open the same, D for feare lest the Christians should together with them enter the towne, and so become masters thereof. Who so shut out by their owne friends, were there all by the Christians slaine, euen in the sight of their companions, not daring to let them in, nor able to relieue them. After which massacre done, the Christians not yet so contented, burnt the suburbes of the towne, and so loaded with the spoyles of their enemies, departed. The Countie after so many honourable exploits in a small time by him performed, returned to Lippa, where hee arriued the fiue and twentieth of September, and from thence afterward aduertising Bassa the Emperours Lieutenant Generall, of these his exploits done, caused ten of the Turkes Ensignes, all stayned with their owne bloud, to be presented vnto him, as the sure tokens of his good seruice done.

The Visier Bassa seeketh to gaine Strigonium by offering of the Christians peace.

E But to returne againe vnto the siege of Strigonium, the greatest exploit by the Turkes entended for this yeare, from which wee haue from the occurrent of the same time a little strayed. The Visier Bassa perceiuing by the valiant and resolute defence of our men, how little hee preuayled in this siege, and that it was like enough to tend at length to his dishonour, thought it good once againe to proue, if hee might by composition gaine that which hee was now almost out of hope by force to obtaine. And to that purpose caused a motion to be made vnto the besieged, for a treatie to be had concerning a peace, and a day appointed for the same. Vnto which motion for peace the Imperials (although they had no hope at all, of any peace to be concluded) easily yeelded, lest they might be thought obstinately to haue reiected the same. Whereupon Commissioners were on both sides ap-

Deputies appointed to entreat with the Turkes of peace.

F poynted to meet together, to conferre of the matter. And so for the Emperour Albert himselfe, with Ferdinand Collenitz, and Fredericke of Hohenlo, Countie of Rhene, were appointed neere vnto the Rascian towne to meet with the Turkes Commissioners, to heare what they would say. Howbeit the Commissioners on both sides beeing met at the place aforesaid, all their conference was but vaine and to no purpose; the Turkes still vrging the yeelding yeelding vp of Strigonium, and the Imperials as earnestly refusing the same. So that the treatie for peace being broken off, and the Commissioners departing, the siege was more cruelly G by the Turks continued than before.

The Cossackes depart out of the Turks camp vnto the Christians.

Now there were in the Turkes armie lying at the siege, certaine companies of Cossackes, men for their pay indifferent to serue any Prince of what religion soeuer. Which seruiceable men, in number 700, had agreed together the 28 of September, by night to forsake the Turks campe, and to come vnto the Christians. Of which their purpose and designe the Visier Bassa hauing by some vntrustie amongst them got knowledge, caused the footmen of these companies to be apprehended and slaine; the horsemen in the meane time making themselues way ouer the bellies of such as would haue stayed them, fled, and escaped, some them to Komara, and some to Dotis. Threescore of these Cossacks being by the Turks hard pursued, ad- H uentured to swim ouer Danubius, and so all naked came to Collonitz, by whome were courteously entertained and apparelled. And within three daies after, two hundred horsemen moe of the same Cossacks came vnto Collonitz also: who marching in good order vnto the head of the Christian campe, were there sworne vnto the Emperors seruice; and in token of their loyaltie, there discharged their pistols thrice. Which horsemen Collonitz diuided among the rest of his troupes, as hauing before time had good experience of the courage and good seruice of diuers such others of their fellowes.

The Ianizaries mutinie against the Visier Bassa.

By these fugitiue souldiers it was vnderstood, that the Ianizaries in great number vp in mutinie against the Visier Bassa, would haue enforced him to haue raised the siege, and so to I haue departed. The cause of their so great discontentment (as they pretended) was the manifest and assured danger of their liues, with little or no hope at all for the gayning of the place: They themselues beeing still exposed to the dangers both of the siege and of the field, hauing the besieged on head of them armed with an assured resolution, and the Christian armie at their backs, of knowne valour and experience. Besides that, the place it selfe was (as they said) impregnable, being at all times to be relieued, by reason that it commanded ouer the Danubie, which might alwaies relieue it both with men and victuals. And that therefore, after that they had satisfied their honour, by giuing of an assault or two vnto the fort of Saint Thomas, they had resolued to arise, and to be gone. And much about this time, viz. the nine and twentieth of September, in the night time, was a most dreadful fierie impression seen in fashion much like a Rainbow, of a fierie red colour, which beginning ouer Cockera, and ri- K sing higher ouer Strigonium, at length vanished away ouer the fort of S. Thomas. The sight whereof much troubled the beholders thereof, as well the Christians as the Turkes: such strange meteors and apparitions being oftimes the presages of the ruine of them to whom they appeare.

In the meane time whilest the Turkes thus lay before Strigonium, at the siege of Saint Thomas fort, the Lord Bassa, Lieutenant Generall of the Emperours forces, to giue the Turkes to vnderstand, how that he was alwaies in readinesse to attend vpon their doings, and to take hold of all such opportunities as should by them bee offered, and so to keepe them in suspence, came with seuen thousand braue horsemen, and shewed himselfe in the plaine field in order of battell; so, as it were, brauing the Turkes euen vnto their owne trenches: where hauing L discharged their pistols thrice, they returned as victorious, alwaies keeping themselues in order, as men readie either to giue or to accept of battell. Howbeit the Turkes for the present keeping themselues close within their trenches, mooued not; but afterwards being desirous to counter-braue this the Christians presumption, the third day of October they came forth of their trenches, and gaue a second assault vnto Saint Thomas fort, imploying the vttermost of their power in this action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their honour and of their safetie to depend. But in assaying the fort they met with them as resolutely set downe for the defence thereof, and for the maintenance of their honour, as were they for the winning of the same. So the assault was begun with great furie and aduenture, as was the other before: howbeit that it endured not long, for that the Turkes fought rather for the M discharge of their durie, and to haue some just cause to raise their siege, than for any hope they had to preuaile, or to carrie the place. For it befell, that according as they had expected, so that after that the fight had endured little more than halfe an houre, amiddest the tempests of armes and furie, in fine the Turkes out of hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the siege, and retired, hauing

A hauing in that conflict lost fiue hundred of their best souldiers.

The shamefull treason of the Haiduckes of Strigonium.

The Gouernour of Strigonium had in the citie vnder his charge six thousand Haiduckes, who attainted with treason and feare, all forsooke the place excepting fiue hundred, preferring their liues, vnworthie the sauing, before their dutie, and the life and honour of their Generall. With which shameful treason, and the resolution of the great Bassa for forcing of the place, the Germanes there left, seeing their Captaines dismaied, gathered themselues together, promising by their owne valour, to supplie what wanted by reason of the trecherie of the others, offering themselues to be sworne againe vnto the seruice of the Emperour, and rather to die all in the place, than to yeeld it vp vnto the Turkes, or to leaue it vnto their enemies: where by their generall consent a solemne decree was made, That whosoeuer he were which B should speake or once make mention of yeelding the towne, should forthwith therefore bee hanged vpon a gibbet. The Turkes although they had now in two assaults beene twice repulsed, came yet forth once againe the fifth day of October, and assaulted Saint Thomas fort the third time: wherein they fayled not to doe what they might, but were by the Christians therein so receiued, that despairing of the winning thereof, they with great losse and shame retired. Which disgrace caused them to returne to their old practises, for the taking of places by policie. For hauing in many places vndermined the wals, and filled them with gunpouder, they were in hope by that means to haue opened themselues a way vnto their conquest. Of which their hope for all that, they were deceiued: for the Christians hauing per- The Turkes seeking to undermine the fort of S. Thomas, disappointed of their purpose. A treatie for peace.

ceiued their meaning, did by countermining not onely frustrate their endeauour, but carried C away the pouder also, which they had before layed in the mines, reseruing it to their owne further necessitie and vse. Wherefore the Turkes seeing themselues of their hope deceiued, returned againe vnto their old practises, to come to a parley for peace. Of which their motion the Christians nothing disliked. But the Commissioners on both sides being met together for that purpose, in a little Island beneath Strigonium, when as the Turkes had offered vnto the Christians the Citie of Agria for Strigonium; or if so be that that exchange pleased them not, but that they would needs keepe the Citie of Strigonium still, that then in consideration of the peace, they should deliuer vnto them the strong townes of Filleck, Saint Setschin, Pallanke, and Nouigrade; both of which demaunds were verie vnreasonable: The Commissioners thereupon againe departed without concluding of any The treatie broken off, and nothing concluded.

Now the armie of the Turkes was in it selfe diuersly diuided with quite contrarie desires; the Visier Bassa with some other of the Commanders, stood stifly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to returne from thence with victorie, or else there to end their daies: but the Ianizaries to the contrarie, were as earnest to bee gone, and to raise the siege, deeming it The Ianizaries vnwilling to continue the siege of Strigonium.

impossible as then to preuaile against a place so strong, so well manned, and so easily to be still relieued. With which their resolution so contrarie vnto his, the Bassa enraged, and yet proposing before his departure to proue the vttermost of his forces against the fort now alreadie by him thrice before assaulted, the tenth of October gaue thereunto six great assaults, but with The fort of S. Thomas six times in one day assaulted by the Turkes.

like successe as before, finding there still the same defendants, no whit discouraged, but armed E with their accustomed resolution. For the defendants encouraged by their most valiant commanders, with such furie repulsed the Turks, that they were glad to giue ouer assault vpon assault, and with great losse of their men to retire. Their often retreats also being vnto them no lesse hurtfull than were their assaults, the deadly bullets being out of the fort discharged vpon them like showers of haile. So that the Bassa now after so many assaults, out of all hope to gaine the fort, and still pressed by the Ianizaries for the raysing of the siege, immediatly after The siege of Strigonium giuen ouer by the Turkes.

rose with his armie, quitted his trenches, and retired with his campe neere vnto a castle, about a league distant from Strigonium. From whence the Turks, the better to couer their dishonour, and to hinder the Christians from pursuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the field with a good part of their armie, and shewed themselues before the Rascian towne, and there skirmished with the Christian Haiduckes. Which manner of skirmi- F shing for all that was more in shew, than in effect, neither partie therein receiuing any great losse or hurt. In the meane time, the besieged which were in Strigonium, hauing gotten certaine knowledge, that the enemie had alreadie remooued his cannon and other prouision for the siege backe againe into Buda, in token of joy discharged all their great Ordnance out out of the citie and the fort, by the report thereof giuing knowledge vnto the other townes and castles of the Christians, of their deliuerance. Of which so common a ioy euery one of them were partakers, as deliuered from some part of the feare which the siege of so great a Citie as was Strigonium, had brought vpon them. And so the siege of Strigonium, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turkes giuen ouer the thirteenth of October: the Ianizaries insolently threatening to haue slaine the great Bassa their Generall, if he had there any longer staied.

Bassa the Emperours Lieutenant in the meane time awaiting all opportunities, failed not to take hold of so fit an occasion, but with his horsemen following after the Turks armie, slew of them a great number, and tooke some other of them prisoners. And afterward returning vnto their campe, found it void of men, but full of bullets, with certain pieces of great ordnance, which the Turks had left there, hauing not time to remoue the same to Buda. Vpon his rising of the Turks armie the Commanders thereof were diuersly affected vnto the sending that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the siege. Such of them as lay in Hungarie, or neere thereunto, desiring still to hold the field, in hope of the spoile of the countrey: but they which dwelt farther off, especially such as were come out of Asia, desiring as much to be discharged, their horses being almost all dead with faintnesse and trauell, and themselues wearie of the seruice.

Shortly after the rising of the Turkes armie from Strigonium, two fugitiues of the Turkes most brauely mounted, came vnto Bassa the Emperors Lieutenant, and presenting him with a ring of great value, and a most faire Turkish Ensigne, told him most part of the Turks armie to lie then incamped in the country neere vnto Pesth; & the great Cham, a yong Prince of about twentie yeares old to be come thither with a great power of Tartars, to aid the Bassa: And that the Turks by their comming incouraged, were determined yet to make a great excursion for the spoiling of the countrey. All which shortly after was certainly knowne to be true, the plaine countrey of the vpper Hungarie about Palanka, Setschin, and Villecampe, beeing by them, but especially by these new come Tartars, all spoyled and burnt. For remedie whereof Sigefride Collonitz opposing himselfe with his Hungarian horsemen, against these insolent forragers, so danted them, that ceasing further to spoile the country, they departed, carrying away with them such prisoners and spoile as they had there taken, and leauing behind them a strong garrison of three thousand good souldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Pesth, but a little before cowardly (as we said) by the Christians forsaken. But within some few daies after, viz. the foure and twentieth of October, the Visier Bassa by his letters written vnto Countie Althem Gouernour of Strigonium, made a mention for a treatie of peace to bee had for the comfort of the distressed people of that spoyled Countrey, solemnly protesting, most religiously on his part to keepe the same, if it should bee once concluded: and yet in the meane time with fire and sword spoiling all the Countrey by the way as hee departed out of Hungarie.

The vpper Hungarie by the Turkes and Tartars spoiled and burnt.

The Visier Bassa by his letters maketh a motion for the treatie of peace.

New rebellion in Transiluania raised by Istuan, syrnamed Botscay.

But now as this poore Countrey began to feele reliefe by the departure of the great Bassa with his army out thereof, so the Countrey of Transyluania joyning thereunto, was at the same time as much with rebellion and discord distressed. Bethlin Habor the Rebell, with his Bassa ouerthrowne and driuen out of Transyluania (as is aforesaid) the Lord Belgiosa, Bassa his Lieutenant in this Prouince, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himselfe ready with his troups, to haue gon to aid the Lord Bassa his Generall, then incamped in the plains of Strigonium, to hinder the Turks designes for the taking of this towne. But as hee was about so to haue done, behold, euen at the same time when hee least feared, a second Rebell there started vp, far worse than the first, namely the lord Istuan (otherwise syrnamed Botscay, or more truly * Potscay) who accompanied with great troupes of men of warre vnder the protection of the Turke, and stiling himselfe by the name of the Prince of Transyluania, entering that Prouince, miserably burnt and spoyled the same. For the repressing of which so sudden a rebellion, Belgiosa with a thousand horse, vnder the leading of Retkouitz and Peter Lasla, marched toward Veradin: and with his troupe comming to Adorn a countrey village about a league distant from Veradin, and meaning thither to assemble together his armie, hee sent to Petsie Gouernour of Veradin, to put him in minde of his dutie, and to craue his aid. Which valiant Captaine, alwaies prest and readie to do his prince seruice, failed not now of his dutie, but calling

He wasin storn called Potscay (which in the Bohemian language signifieth tarry, or stay) of the long delaies he by way of disgrace had before endured in the emperors Court.

A ling together six companies of footmen out of Romosa, and joyning vnto them foure companies out of Veradin, together with the Silesian horsmen of Schuet-Kenhut his regiment (whom by reason of his sickenesse he was not able to lead) and with them the Haiduckes of Countie Tambier, came vnto the place of the rendezuous, bringing with him all warlike prouision in token of his fidelitie. With this armie Belgiosa marched against the Rebels, who as resolute men attented his comming: for why, Botscay knowing the Haiducks of Countie Tambier secretly to fauour him and his rebellion more than they did Belgiosa and his just quarrels, stood in no feare of them, but assured himselfe of them as of his friends; who failed not of his hope and expectation, but euen at the first joyning of the battell, turned themselues to his part: with the going ouer of whom, the number of the Rebels was much encreased, and Belgiosa his po-
B wer both in force and courage much weakened, seeing themselues now once exposed both vnto the force of their enemies, and to the trecherie of their fellowes, who now with conjoyned forces most fiercely assailed them: who finding themselues now on all sides enuironed with so great a multitude, and not able with so small a number as was left, to withstand the violence of their enemies, and the treason of their companions; after they had to the vtmost of their power performed all the parts of valiant and couragious men, were there almost all cut in pieces, and there buried in the field of their loyaltie, honoured with their owne bloud, and altogether embrued with the bloud of their enemies. In this vnluckie and disloyal fight were C diuers good and faithfull Captaines slaine: Petsie Gouernour of Veradin, and Pallas Lippa, both great Captaines, and grieuously wounded, were there taken prisoners. The Lieutenant of Petsie also, hauing retyred himselfe with some of his troupes into a place of good strength, there so valiantly defended themselues, that Botscay out of hope to ouercome them by force, to get them into his power, promised them vpon his Oath, if they would yeeld themselues, to suffer them in safetie to depart. But what trust or credit is to be giuen to him who hath before broken his faith and loyaltie to his Prince, this Rebell well shewed by the death of these valiant and warlike men, who after that they had vpon his faith and promise yeelded themselues, were by his appointment cruelly slaine and cut in pieces. The Silesian horsemen were there also all ouerthrowne and buried in the middest of their enemies: and as for Belgiosa himselfe, he strangely escaped out of the battaile, and saued himselfe by flying to Veradin. The victorious Rebell after the battaile, in stead of praising God, sacrificed to D the Diuell, by sending a great part of the Ensignes by him gained, vnto the Visier Bassa, with a thousand praises of his glorie, for supporting of him in his rebellion; and vaunting much of this his victorie, gaue him withall to vnderstand, That he had slaine aboue six thousand of his enemies.

Belgiosa goeth against the rebels of Transyluania.

Botscay dealeth vnfaithfully with such as vpon his faith giuen vnto them, yeelded vnto him.

Botscay in his rebellion countenanced by the Great Sultan, and called prince of Transyluania.

This victorie gotten, together with the humble submission of Botscay, obtained of the Great Sultan, That from thenceforth hee should be stiled by the name of the Prince of Transyluania, with a further charge from him, to do the vttermost of his endeauour for the subduing vnto his obeysance the rest of Transyluania; promising plentifully to supplie his wants both with men and money, and out of hand to send him three thousand Tartars to his ayd. And indeed this was a verie great and bloudie battell, fought from the first breake of the E day, vntill eleuen a clocke at noone: but whether so many were slaine there or no, it cannot certainely be told, for that diuers of them who were said to be slaine, and so accounted among the dead, had hid themselues in the wood thereby, and some others of them by some other meanes escaped death also. Petsie himselfe had with him when hee was taken, two Monkes, whom the souldiours in despight cut into many pieces, and carried him fast bound in chaines to Derritza, to be there cured of the dangerous wounds by him in the battaile receiued.

But as for Pallas Lippa, who being wounded, was taken prisoner with Petsie, hee was afterwards by Botscay appointed his Lieutenant Generall, and so by his commaundement was publiquely proclaimed; as he which was desirous to take vpon him the defence of the refor-F med Religion, and of such as were willing to professe the same: who forthwith made a generall proclamation, That all they which were desirous of the libertie of conscience, and to liue free from the superstitions of the Roman Church, should repaire vnto him as vnto their head and chiefetaine, readie to entertaine them, and to allow to euerie one of them fiue Dollars a moneth for their pay. Vpon which Proclamation made, a great multitude of men vpon the

ſudden reſorted vnto him; ſo that in a ſhort time he had following of him ten thouſand Haiducks, beſide a number of other of the common raſcall people; yea, almoſt all the gentlemen of the countrey repairing vnto him, bound themſelues by oath to him, and one of them to another, That as they would not take vp armes to fight againſt the Chriſtian Emperor, ſo they would not ſubm[it] themſelues vnto the Turke, but onely ſtand vpon the defence of their religion, and the liberty of conſcience.

The rebell Botſcay thus wonderfully encreaſed in ſtrength and number, beſet almoſt all the paſſages of the countrey, and with the ſword of rebellion in his hand, and his ſouldiers following him, commanded the cities ſtil as he went, to yeeld vnto him: but, hearing that Belgioſa was after the late ouerthrow gone from Veradin to Caſſouia, where his wife lay, and being come thither, to haue been by the citiſens reiected, who would not only not re[ceiue] him into their citie, but turned his wife alſo out of the citie vnto him, he with a great armie [coming] thither, tooke the Citie without reſiſtance, the Citiſens for the moſt part enclining [vnto] him: Of which Citie being poſſeſſed, hee forthwith changed both the Religion and ciuile gouernement thereof, ſlew part of ſuch as were of the Romiſh Religion, and thruſt the reſt out of the Citie, with all the Church-men, tooke the Biſhop and the Emperours Treaſuror priſoners, and ſo changed the whole gouernment of the towne vp-ſide downe. The onely man he ſtood in feare of, was Belgioſa, for whom he laid wait by all meanes hee could to haue taken him, with a purpoſe to haue vſed him moſt hardly, if he had fallen into his hands.

The great citie of Caſſouia yeelded to the rebel Botſcay.

An impudent ſhift of the Viſier Baſſa for the ſauing of his credit with the great Sultan.

These things thus done in Tranſyluania and in Hungarie, the Viſier Baſſa being about to returne to Conſtantinople, to grace that little which he had done this yeare in Hungarie, and to auoid the ſuſpition of his euill ſucceſſe in that Prouince, borrowed of Botſcay the reſt of the Enſignes, together with Petſie and other the noble Chriſtian captiues which he had taken in the late battell with Belgioſa: which Enſignes and priſoners he confidently afterwards cauſed to be preſented vnto the Great Sultan Achmat, as taken by himſelfe; and in recompence thereof, left three thouſand Turks and Tartars with the Rebell, to aid him in his wars both in Tranſyluania and Hungarie.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in Hungarie, and Gouernour of Tranſyluania, hearing of the ſtirres and troubles of late raiſed in both thoſe Countreys, by Botſcay and his rebellious Followers, and hauing as he thought beſt, ſet all things in order againe at Strigonium, marched thence with his Armie, being fourteene thouſand ſtrong, towards Caſſouia, with a purpoſe to haue ſuppreſſed the rebellion in the vpper Hungarie, before it ſhould haue ſpred farther, to the endangering of the whole ſtate of both thoſe Countreys, as afterward it did. Howbeit before hee could come thither, the Rebels after the taking of Caſſouia, being wonderfully encreaſed both in ſtrength and number, had taken in moſt of the ſtrong Townes and places in the vpper Hungarie, the people almoſt generally now fauouring their quarrell, carrying with it the face of Religion, with the ſuppreſſing of the German gouernment, both things vnto them much pleaſing. And now hearing that Belgioſa (a man of them moſt hated, being as we ſaid, ſhut out of Caſſouia) was fled into the Caſtle of Zipze, they by Letters required of Turſon Captaine of the Caſtle, to haue him deliuered vnto them, to be according to his deſerts puniſhed; promiſing withall, to doe Turſon himſelfe no harme, ſo that hee would take part with them in the defence of their Religion, and of the libertie of conſcience: which if hee ſhould refuſe to doe, yet that they would giue him free libertie to depart whither he would, out of his Caſtle, and in ſafety to conduct him thither, ſo that hee would forthwith reſolue, what courſe hee would take: But if hee ſhould of this his offer miſlike alſo, then they threatened to ſpoyle his Countrey, to kill his people, to raſe his Caſtle, and to make himſelfe an example vnto others. Wherewith for all that, he nothing mooued, refuſed to deliuer vnto them Belgioſa, the man whom they ſo much deſired, or yet to accept of any of their other offers. Whereupon the Rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt Caſſouia and the Caſtle, and bringing certaine pieces of great Ordnance from Caſſouia, in great number came and ſtraightly beſieged the Caſtle. With whoſe attempts the valiant Captaine nothing mooued, with his thundering ſhot out of the Caſtle ſo welcommed them, that hauing thereby receiued great harme, they thought it not their beſt courſe to ſtay any longer there with with ſo great a power, but with the greateſt part thereof to go to Presburg, to reforme that citie and ſome other places by the way; perſuading themſelues, That the Captaine of this caſtle ſo ſhut vp, and on euerie ſide beſet with his enemies, would at length of himſelf yeeld vp the caſtle.

But while the Rebels thus lay at the ſiege of this caſtle, certaine companies of them went to haue taken the ſpoile of a Religious houſe there by: but comming thither, and breaking open the doores, and ſearching euery ſecret corner of the houſe, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of, but ſo returned almoſt emptie handed: for the Prieſts had for feare of them before carried away with them all the beſt of their goods and ſubſtance into the beſieged caſtle. And ſo likewiſe the rife report of their comming to Presburg flying abroad, almoſt all the Prieſts and Ieſuits in Presburg and the countrey thereabout, leauing their Churches and Colledges, fled with their ſubſtance to Vienna, ſcarcely accounting themſelues ſafe there, vntill that the garriſon of that ſtrong citie was increaſed with a new ſupplie of ſixe hundred good ſouldiers.

The Prieſts and Ieſuits for feare of the Haiduckes flie from Presburg to Vienna.

And now the Rebels, their number ſtill more and more encreaſing, and hauing ſet all the vpper part of Hungarie on a broile, were beſieging diuers other caſtles and ſtrong places, yet holden for the Emperor; when as Baſta in the meane time, comming from the ſiege of Strigonium, came and with his armie incamped about three miles from Filek. Of whoſe comming the Rebels hearing, and thereupon retyring, he forthwith followed after them toward Budnoc, which caſtle they alſo left, and ſo neere vnto Ramoſambat, the place of their rendezuous, gathered together in great number, with an intent to haue giuen Baſta battell. Whereof Baſta hauing knowledge, to ſpare the effuſion of more Chriſtian bloud, by an herauld ſent vnto them in friendly and courteous manner, aduiſed them to change their mindes, and to returne againe vnto their former allegeance. But finding them obſtinately ſet downe in their former purpoſe, for the maintaining of their rebellion, and the giuing of him battell, he marching forward with his armie, with great force charged certaine companies of the Rebels, appointed to keepe the paſſage of Filek; who at the firſt right valiantly receiued the charge, and defended the paſſage, vntill that at length with number oppreſſed, and aboue foure hundred of them ſkaine, they were put to the worſe, and enforced to flee; in which flight, amongſt others there taken priſoners, Blaſe Nemet their captaine was taken alſo, whom Baſta cauſed to be hanged vp by the heeles, with the enſignes ſet vp about him which he had taken from the Rebels in the late fight; and after he had for a time ſo hung, made him to be taken downe, and his head to be ſtrucke off from his ſhoulders. In this conflict fiftie of Baſta his men were ſlain alſo, and many moe hurt, and amongſt them Coſonitz, hurt in his ſhoulder and his foot with a ſmall ſhot.

Certaine companies of the rebels diſcomfited and ouerthrowne by the Lord Baſta.

Baſta after this victorie marching on with his armie, by the way met with certaine other companies of the rebellious Haiducks as he was going to S. Peters, with whom he had [fought] an hot skirmiſh for the ſpace of three dayes together, being by them ſtill put to the worſe, [in] ſomuch that hauing burnt many of his carriages, tents, and other luggage, he was of [nothing] more carefull, than how well to get out of their hands. Neuertheleſſe ſeeing no other remedie, he with great courage not onely endured the often and fierce aſſaults of [his enemies] more and more encreaſing vpon him, but the fourth day after ſo many vnfortunate [daies] (being the eight and twentieth of Nouember) putting his men in order of battell, valiantly againe charged the Rebels: who by reaſon of the darkeneſſe of the [day] then a verie thicke miſt, being not able to perceiue where the enemies [were], be feared, or what way to turne their owne forces; as men diſmaied, [were] ouerthrowne and put to flight: whom ſo flying, Baſta with his ſouldiers [purſued] made of them a great ſlaughter: ſo that in the ſpace of leſſe than [two houres] of them were in this thicke and darke miſt ſlaine, with ſome few [taken priſoners], and amongſt them Fredericke Earle of Solmes, and the Countie [Rogendorffe] the report of which ouerthrow, the Rebels which yet lay at the [ſiege of Caſſouia] hope there at length to haue taken Belgioſa, forthwith roſe [from the ſiege]. But Baſta after this victorie remouing to S. Andrewes, [and] the Rebels, and thereinto put a new garriſon, and [ſo] repreſſed the inſolencie of the Haiduckes in th to keepe the field with his armie in so vnseasonable a time of the yeare, and so to maintain war as it were both against his enemies, and the extremities of nature, sought by letters to haue reclaimed them of Cassouia againe vnto their obedience; offering vnto them pardon for all their offences past, so that they would now at last acknowledge their fault, and receiue into their towne a garrison of the Emperors. To which purpose he writ also to them of Eperia; in hope that if he might so haue gained those two strong townes, to haue in them wintered in safetie with his armie. But they of Cassoula hauing in the citie a strong garrison of six thousand good souldiers, and out of feare to be by Basta besieged at that time of the yeare, and withall in hope (if need were) to be by Botscay relieued, (who was then reported to be fortie thousand strong) vtterly refused to hearken vnto Basta his motion, for their reconciliation, or at all to submit themselues againe vnto the Emperor. Which caused him with his armie to come neerer vnto the citie, yet still seeking rather by faire meanes to haue perswaded the citizens to haue returned vnto their loyaltie, than by force to haue constrained them. Finding them obstinately set downe, and by no persuasions to be remoued, but with their ordnance in what they might to trouble his campe, he sent before, the Countie Hohenloh and Rotwitz, with part of his armie to Eperia, to command them vpon their allegeance to receiue the Emperors souldiers into the citie and to relieue them with such things as they were able: and within a few dayes after, viz. the fifth of December, followed himselfe with the rest of his armie. But being come thither, after much talke had with the chiefe men of the Citie, it was at length, contrarie to all mens expectation, agreed, That Basta assuring them of the free exercise of their religion, of the good behauiour of the souldiers towards them, and to defend them from the iniurie and incursions of their enemies, they should open their gates vnto the Imperials, and relieue them with what they were able, and so as before to continue in their allegeance and obedience vnto the Emperor. Of all which things when Basta had vpon his faith giuen, assured them, they opened their gates and receiued in the souldiers: vnto whom (now almost dead and starued with hunger) nothing could haue happened more comfortable or welcome. Leusta, Barbeld, and Zebena, famous townes in those places, following the example of Eperia, submitted themselues in like manner, and helped Basta his souldiers with reliefe. Thither with great danger came vnto Basta, Sigefrid Collonitz, a man of great power and authoritie in that part of Hungarie, to confer with him about the appeasing of these troubles: who afterward by his letters vnto the States and the rest of the Nobilitie of Hungarie, yea and to Botscay himselfe, in vaine persuaded them to lay downe armes, and to returne againe vnto their wonted obedience vnto the Emperour.

The citizens of Cassouia refuse to submit themselues, and to receiue the emperors soldiers into their city.

Eperia yeelded vnto Basta.

There had been hitherto in the Imperiall campe great scarcitie of victuals and of other necessaries, so that for want thereof, and for the extremitie of the cold, and other miseries, it was greatly feared, lest the campe should haue been broken vp; to the irrepairable losse of his Imperial Majestie, as the state of things then stood in Hungary. For the remedie whereof, thirtie waggons loded with money and cloath were sent from Vienna, vnder the conduct of Countie Solmes, Colonell Starenberg, the Treasurer, and others: vnto whom Tanhusar joyned fifteene hundred Hussars (Hungarian horsemen so called) to strengthen the conuoy against the danger which was feared from the Haiducks which lay vpon the way, and who indeed were now roaming about and seeking after bootie in euerie corner of the countrey. Which Hussars being come with the rest of the conuoy into a thick wood, about two miles from Filek, like enemies set vpon the waggoners, whom they should haue conducted, and there made a great slaughter of such as were about to resist them; insomuch that the Countie Solmes had much ado to saue himselfe, and to get out of their hands, leauing the waggons as a prey vnto the trecherous Hussars; who now become masters of them, draue them away to Botscay the Rebels campe: Tanhusar their Captaine in vaine pursuing after them (with such of his Hussars as more faithfull than the rest, had no hand in that so foule a treacherie) and recouering nothing but tenne waggons loaded with cloath, which the traitors had left behinde them, hauing taken the horses out of them, and put them into the other waggons wherein the mony was, (which was reported to be 130000 florens) with the more speed to bring them vnto Botscay. Who hauing vpon the sudden receiued so great a summe of money, by him not looked for, forthwith diuided the same among his souldiers, the more to encourage them in their rebellion against the Emperour.

The Hussars traiterously spoile them whome they should haue conducted.

The

The newes of this so great a losse being quickly spred thorow all the Emperours campe, at the first filled the souldiers with griefe and disdaine against the trecherous Hussars, but afterwards with wrath and indignation against their owne Commanders, as deeming it to haue bin nothing but a false report by them deuised and giuen out to deceiue them, and to feed them with a vaine hope. Which perswasion, though not true, had now so strongly possessed their mindes, as that they were about al to haue risen vp in mutiny, and to haue forsaken the seruice, to the vtter perill of their Captains, and endangering of the whole Prouince, now vpon point to haue been for euer lost. All which mischiefes Basta foreseeing, did first what he might with words and faire promises to haue appeased them; which not seruing, he with certaine thousands of duckats and waggons of cloth taken vp at Leusta and other townes there by, wisely contented them, in some good measure furnishing the old souldiers, before halte naked, both with money and apparell, the souldiers greatest contentments.

Which mutinie so againe appeased, the Imperials shortly after surprising a castle not farre from Eperia, found therein a great many of Hungarian Gentlemen, whom they carried away with them prisoners, to learne of them what they might concerning the Rebels proceedings, and further designes. In the meane time the Haiduckes on the other side besieged the castle of Sendra, which they after many assaults tooke, and put to the sword all the garrison souldiers therin; and departing thence, first rifled and after burnt the towne of Filek. They also took the castles of Boluar, Setschin, Dregell, Burac, Holloc, Blauenstein, and the strong castle of Cabragetia, whither they of Hatwan not long before had carried their great ordnance at such time as they for feare of the Turks, then lying at the siege of Strigonium, had abandoned the place: all strong holds in the vpper Hungaric. After the taking of which places, Ferentius Radiua, and Charles Iffuan (Botscay his neere kinsman) and the chiefe Captains and ringleaders of the rebels, exacted contribution money of the minerall townes (as they call them) belonging vnto the Emperor in the vpper Hungarie; but especially of the city of Newsoll, enforcing them also to sweare to be in all things obedient to Botscay, and to take his part against the Imperials, threatning with fire and sword to infest such places as should refuse to do the like. And to the intent that they should not by Collonitz be encouraged or defended, who to that end was comming thither, the Rebels in great number went to meet him, and hauing belayed all the passages, enforced him to retire himselfe vnto his castle of Libentsia, where he lying in great danger with his wife then in child-bed, accompanied but with 50 German souldiers only, for that he durst not to trust his Hungarian Cossackes, now in heart altogether enclining vnto the Rebels, was glad in post to send to Vienna, most humbly requesting to haue a new supply of German souldiers sent vnto him for his reliefe, and the furtherance of the Emperors seruice, in that so dangerous a time and wauering estate of that countrey, being the best part of that the Emperour then held in Hungarie.

Diuers places taken by the Haiduckes.

Collonitz prayeth aid from Vienna.

Now while Basta thus lay with his armie at Eperia and in the countrey thereabout, he dayly receiued great harme from the Haiduckes, who were still houering about him, as Hawkes ouer their prey; his souldiers, by necessitie enforced to fetch in wood, and other things necessarie into the campe, being still most miserably slaine and cut in pieces; yea, they were so bold, as oftentimes to trouble him in his campe, and to assayle his souldiers where they lay quartered in their trenches; as amongst other times, they did in the latter end of December to end the yere withall: at which time they by night breaking into the quarter where Charles Collonitz, with Copell and Pettenger, two Captaines of Austria, with their companies lay, they slew the said Copell, with almost all his souldiers, and burnt Pettinger in his tent, Collonitz himselfe beeing at the same time in great danger, and hardly by them beset also; vntill that encouraging his men, by performing all the parts both of a good Captaine and valiant souldier, hee by true valour enforced them at length to retyre backe againe into the woods, from whence they came, hauing in this conflict slaine foureteene of them with his owne hand.

Copell and Pettinger put to the sword.

About this time was a spie taken in the Imperiall campe, one of Botscay his chiefe men, [illegible] discouered by one comming from Cassouia to Eperia which knew him [illegible] Basta his commandement apprehended, and vpon torture examined, and confessing [illegible] he had done, was for his good seruice hanged and afterward quartered, to the [illegible] like.

The Turks this yeare were not much fortunat in their warres: Hassan the Viſier Baſſa and their Generall againſt the Chriſtians in Hungarie hauing in vaine (as is before declared) beſieged Strigonium, and with all his forces done nothing worth the remembrance; and Cicala Baſſa their other Generall againſt the Perſians in the Eaſt beeing with all his great power by the Perſian King ouerthrowne and put to flight, and the citie of Babylon now called Bagdat taken: [illegible] as firſt at Prague the two and twentieth of October reported by the Secretarie of the Vayuod of Valachia, ſent thither in embaſſage from his Maſter vnto the Emperour, and afterward confirmed by an Embaſſadour ſent from the Perſian King himſelfe vnto the Emperour, who hauing audience, told his Maieſtie, how that the King his Maſter was not ignorant of the great and difficult warre by him now for many yeares maintained againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, with whome although hee for his part might haue liued in [illegible] amitie, yet that mooued with the zeale which one Prince ought to haue to the reliefe [illegible], he had taken vp armes againſt him, ſo to auert ſome part of that heauie warre from his Maieſtie euen vpon himſelfe: and that he had alreadie obtained many great and notable victories and conqueſts againſt him: and recouered a great territorie, wrongfully before taken from the Perſian Kings his predeceſſours by the Turkiſh Sultans: and that now hee was of nothing more deſirous, than to joyne in a perpetuall league and amitie with his Maieſtie, that ſo in a moſt ſtrong confederation combined together, they might neuer afterward be diſſeuered, or euer make peace with the Sultan, without one anothers knowledge and conſent. And further, That for his part hee was minded neuer to giue ouer the warre ſo happily by him begun, vntill hee had driuen him euen into his Imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, ſo that his Maieſtie would on his part doe the like, by continuing of [illegible] warres; it beeing not poſſible for the Turke to hold out againſt them both, and the onely meanes to abate his greatneſſe, and to aſſure them in their eſtates: requeſting him withall, to ſend backe with him ſome graue man his Embaſſadour, with ſufficient authoritie and inſtructions to conferre about theſe matters with him; that ſo knowing and vnderſtanding one anothers minde, the league and confederation betwixt them might the more eaſily and commodiouſly bee made and concluded.

Neither were the Turks buſied with theſe forraine warres onely, againſt theſe ſo great and mightie Princes, in places ſo remote and farre off, but vnto theſe were joyned their owne inteſtine and ciuill warres and troubles alſo; the Rebels beeing yet vp in the leſſer Aſia, and the Baſſa's of Aleppo and Damaſco, two of the moſt famous cities in Siria, and both of them men of great place and command, of late [illegible]mes one of them againſt the other: inſomuch, that they had brought the matter to be t[illegible] the ſword in the plaine field, where the Baſſa of Aleppo in a great and bloudy battell ouercome, and flying vnto his own citie, was by the Baſſa of Damaſco purſued thither, and ſo ſtraitly by him beſieged with an armie of thirty thouſand men, that in fine hee was glad to reconcile himſelfe vnto him, and to make his peace, by yeelding vnto whatſoeuer the other Baſſa his enemie pleaſed to demand of him; as being thereunto driuen by the extremitie of famine, which then reigned in the citie; as alſo for that he had loſt a great number of his men, whom he had ſent ſecretly out of the citie to ſeeke for victuals, being all ſlaine by the Baſſa of Damaſco his ſouldiers. With which ſo great matters the Baſſaes of the Court (who had the mannaging of the State vnder the young Sultan) were much troubled, he himſelfe (as was fitteſt for his yeres) in the meane time delighting himſelfe with the pleaſures of the Court, and much reioycing at the birth of his firſt begotten ſonne, who was about that time borne.

Sultan Achmat his firſt ſonne borne.

1605 The reuolution of time had now thus brought this yeare to an end, the troubles of Hungarie and Tranſyluania yet ſtill more and more ſo encreaſing, as if that thoſe moſt miſerable countries had by the juſt and heauie judgements of God beene now appointed vnto their laſt and vtter ruine and deſtruction: the cauſes of their ſo great miſeries proceeding not ſo much from the Turks their enemies, as from the naturall inhabitants themſelues; who in minds diuided both in religion and affection, ſome of them continuing in their allegeance vnto the Emperor, and other ſome following the Enſignes of the Rebell Botſcay, did both vnto themſelues and to their country more harme in a little time, than had the Turks in many yeres before. Of which ſo dangerous a diſſention, and of the harmes thereof inſuing, Belioioſa left by Baſta as his Lieutenant, was reported to haue beene the firſt and chiefe authour: For whereas the yeare before before the Biſhops and other Clergie men, in an aſſembly of them at Poſſonium, had without the knowledge of the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, publiſhed a decree by them there made, for the burning or perpetuall baniſhing of all ſuch as were of the reformed Religion in Hungarie: and that the States of that Kingdome vnderſtanding thereof, and ſolemnly proteſting againſt the ſame, vnder the Seale of the Lord Palatine, had publiquely affirmed, with juſt armes to defend themſelues, if they ſhould for their religion bee called into queſtion or troubled: and had againe repeated the ſame their proteſtation at Galſet. Yet Belioioſa neuertheleſſe in the meane time by cunning ſeizing vpon the reformed Churches at Caſſouia, would not ſuffer the citiſens of the reformed religion there, to haue any ſermons in their owne priuat houſes, or ſo much as to read on the holy Bible. Neither any whit mooued with the former proteſtations of the Nobilitie and States, had taken vnto himſelfe all the lands and goods of them of their religion in Caſſouia, not ſuffering them to burie the bodies of their dead within the Citie, neere vnto the Monaſteries. And requeſting to haue borrowed of Botſcay certaine thouſands of crownes, and thereof by him denied, cauſed his ſouldiers to ranſacke two of his caſtles, and to ſpoile him of all the wealth and treaſure he therein had. For which indignities and iniuries Botſcay enraged, cauſed open proclamation to be made, That he would giue vnto euerie Haiducke that would ſerue him, foure crownes a moneth pay, with all the bootie that they could get. Whereupon ſix thouſand Haiduckes, which then ſerued vnder Belioioſa, forthwith reuolted vnto Botſcay, their number encreaſing daily. But after that vnto this extraordinarie pay, Pallas Lippa, his Lieutenant, had alſo ioyned the protection of the reformed religion, it is wonderfull to ſay, how the Haiduckes by heaps reſorted vnto him, and how the people in all parts of Hungarie generally fauoured him and his quarrell, being in all places whereas he came, ready to ioyne hands with him againſt the Imperials. The Turks and Tartars alſo, both with men and money furthering him in all his doings, whoſe helpe he refuſed not. Whereof proceeded all the aforeſaid miſeries both in Hungarie and Tranſyluania, with many other worſe than they, which together with the beginning of this yeare tooke their beginning and encreaſe alſo. Vnto which ſo great troubles ſtill more and more encreaſing, Baſta not able by force to giue remedie, ſought by lenitie and faire perſuaſions to haue eaſed the ſame: by letters oftentimes aduiſing euen Botſcay the chiefe Rebell himſelf, to change his minde, to lay downe armes, to disband his forces, and to perſuade with the reſt of his ſeditious followers, to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Emperour, and to returne againe vnto their wonted obedience. Whereunto he at length anſwered, That if the gouernment of all Tranſyluania might be left vnto himſelfe alone: if a naturall Hungarian borne might be ſtill choſen Lieutenant Generall in Hungarie: if none but ſuch as were Hungarians borne ſhould haue the gouernement and command of all the Garriſons in Hungarie: if the Wallon and French ſoldiers might be ſhut out of Hungarie: if the naturall Hungarians borne, might from thenceforth be regarded and prouided of their pay: if it might be lawfull for euery man to haue the free exerciſe of his religion: if the authours of theſe troubles might be deliuered vnto the Hungarians to be puniſhed: if the Emperour himſelfe in perſon ſhould come and be preſent at the parliament at Presburg: if the Germane garriſon ſouldiers ſhould ſtil keepe themſelues within the places whereunto they were appointed, without making of any excurſions into the townes or villages neere vnto them, or hurting of the poore countrie men: he could then be content to come to ſuch a good agreement for peace. With which offer he ſent two of the Rebels, his followers, vnto Baſta, who not liking thereof, returned them backe againe, without concluding of any thing.

Botſcay his vnreaſonable demands for to come to a peace.

But while things were thus in talke, ſome of the Haiducks in the meane time with a number of Tartars ioyned vnto them, in ſeeking after bootie, ſurpriſed Gokara, a town ouer againſt Strigonium: where hauing ſlaine certaine Germanes which had the keeping of the place, and rifled the towne, as they were about to haue ſet it on fire, by the comming ouer of the Gouernour of Strigonium, with his garriſon, they were enforced to forſake the place, and againe to retire. This loſſe receiued at Gokara, was againe by our men requited by the taking of Palantwar, a good fortreſſe of the Turkes, after a long and cruell fight taken by Captaine Barbian (Commander of the Imperiall troupes on this ſide of the riuer of Danubius) whereinto a number of the Turkes being retired, were there together with the garriſon ſouldiers all ſlaine, and amongſt them diuers men of great account, who but ſome few dayes before we come thither. Which fortreſſe the Captaine cauſed to be forthwith raſed, becauſe it ſhould no more ſtand the Turks in ſtead for the annoying of the Chriſtians.

Vacia moſt ſhamefully by the Haiducks betrayed, and deliuered vnto the Turkes.

The Turks about this time had a purpoſe to beſiege Vacia, a city not far from Vicegrade on the other ſide of Danubius, a place which ſtill did them great harme, and ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead. The garriſon of which place was part Germans, and part Hungarians, as the reſt of all the garriſons in the Imperial townes of Hungarie were. Of which the Turks purpoſe for the ſiege, the trecherous Haiducks there in garriſon hauing got vnderſtanding, conſpired to deliuer vnto them the place; and yet not ſo contented, to joyne thereunto a treaſon more bloudie and trecherous than was the betraying of the towne: for finding themſelues by farre too ſtrong for the Germans in garriſon in the towne with them, they fell vpon them, fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew moſt part of them, the reſt ſauing themſelues by ſpeedie flight to Strigonium: and ſo afterward, according to their former pretended treaſon, deliuered the towne vnto the Turks, joyning with them and the Tartars, and directing them for the more eaſie ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and the countrey thereabout.

The taking of this citie of Vacia had in ſhort time called together great numbers of the Turks and Tartars out of all places of the realme; who together with the Haiduckes made a great and puiſſant armie, to the terror of the Chriſtians, not then able to hold the field againſt them, and the encouraging of the Turks, thus holpen euen by the Chriſtians themſelues, to the deſtroying of one another. With this army they turned from Vacia to Gokara, with a purpoſe from thence to haue paſſed ouer the Danubius vpon the yce, and to haue ſurpriſed Strigonium. Which exploit they had once before attempted againſt the baſe towne, being then by the Chriſtians repulſed and beaten backe with their great and ſmall ſhot out of the towne, as now they were againe. Howbeit that ſeeing the number of their enemies dayly more and more to encreaſe, they in Strigonium ſtood more in doubt of a ſecond ſiege, than they had done of the firſt, whereof we haue before ſpoken.

Strigonium in vain attempted to haue bin ſurpriſed by the Turkes and the Haiducks.

The report of theſe ſo great troubles, and of the general reuolt of the diſcontented Haiducks in Hungarie, much troubled and grieued the Chriſtian Emperor: Who both in reſpect of his honour, and of the ſafetie of his eſtate, raiſed what power he might out of his prouinces thereabout, and leuied great ſummes of money from his ſubiects, taking a ducket vpon euery houſe in Auſtria, being then in great feare of theſe miſeries and miſchiefes ſo faſt ſpreading, and ſtill more and more encreaſing and approching that way. Vnto whoſe forces alreadie on foot, had the aid promiſed from the King of Spaine, the Pope, the Princes of Italy and Germanie, with ſix thouſand footmen and ſo many thouſand horſe out of Bohemia, been in time joyned, they might haue made a ſufficient armie vnder the conduct of Baſta the Emperors Lieutent, to haue repreſſed both the attempts of the enemie, and the inſolencie of the rebellious Haiducks. All or moſt part of which aid this yeare failing, and Baſta with his ſmall forces much weakened with wants and the extremitie of Winter, and not able to keepe the field, the enemies ſtill encreaſing both in number and in ſtrength, and without feare of any to encounter them, at their pleaſure roaming vp and downe, began now to draw neere vnto Vicegrade (a good and ſtrong towne of Hungarie ſtanding vpon the ſide of Danubius, about the mid way betwixt Buda and Strigonium) with a purpoſe to haue beſieged the ſame. Of whoſe comming the Germans there in garriſon hearing, and warned by the trecherie of the Haiducks of Vacia, what to feare from the Haiducks in garriſon with them in Vicegrade, betime retyred themſelues out of the towne into the caſtle. In which doing they were well aduiſed, being otherwiſe like enough to haue run the ſame fortune that the Germanes their fellowes before had done at Vacia. For the Turks with the rebellious Haiducks were no ſooner come thither, but that the Haiducks in the towne, without more ado, opened the gates of the towne vnto them, as vnto their friends, directing them in beſt ſort they could both for the beſieging and winning of the caſtle. Which while the Turks hardly beſieged, and the Germans therein notably defended, Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, together with Begedes Baſſa, to perſuade them to yeeld vp the caſtle, writ vnto them in this ſort.

The towne of Vicegrade by the Haiducks yeelded vnto the Turkes.

The Letters of Haſſan the Viſier, and of Begedes Baſſa, vnto the German ſouldiors beſieged in the caſtle Right worthie and valiant friends, it is not to you vnknowne, the Caſtle of Vicegrade of right to belong vnto our moſt mightie and dread Soueraigne, the Great Sultan. And therefore ſeeing that it is reaſon that euerie man ſhould haue that which of right belongeth vnto him; We aduertiſe and requeſt queſt you to yeeld vp the ſame Caſtle vnto our moſt mightie Emperour, and the honourable Lord Srephen Botſcay, Prince of Hungarie; and with all your ſubſtance to depart thence. Promiſing you vpon our faith and honour, to ſuffer you quietly and in ſafetie with your wiues and children, bag and baggage, to depart thence; and to prouide you ſufficient ſhipping for the carrying away of your things to Strigonium. And if it ſhall pleaſe you to take part with vs, wee promiſe you the ſame pay from our Emperour, that you had from your owne; and the ſame kinde entertainement which the Wallons haue before had with vs. But if that you vpon an obſtinate reſolution ſhall refuſe this our friendly motion and grace offered you, blame vs not, if we ſhall by ſtrong hand and force of armes ſeeke to obtaine our right. In kindeneſſe we offer you our friendſhip, and ſo with ſpeed expect your anſwer.

But the Germanes hearkening not vnto theſe letters, as men reſolued, valiantly ſtood vpon the defence of themſelues, and of the place, vntill that by extreame neceſſity forced thereunto, they yeelded the ſame by compoſition.

Baſta perplexed publiſheth a generall pardon vnto the rebels.

Baſta in the meane time with his forces much diminiſhed, lying at Eperia, and in the countrey thereabout, ſeeing the generall reuolt of the Haiducks, of late the Emperours greateſt ſtrength in Hungarie, and Botſcay the Rebels ſtrength dayly to encreaſe more and more, with no poſſibility for himſelf with ſuch ſmal forces as he then had, to repreſſe the Rebels inſolency, or to remedie theſe ſo far ſpreading euils, but for want of greater ſtrength he muſt lie ſtil as it were a man beſieged, was therewith exceedingly grieued, and as it were almoſt ouerwhelmed with the heauie burthen of ſo many great miſeries at once beſetting him. To threaten without power hee knew to be but folly; and to ſpeake faire, to be but vaine. Neuertheleſſe hauing procured from the Emperour a generall pardon for all ſuch as hauing taken part with the Rebels, were willing to returne againe to their alleageance: hee to aſſure all them whom it might concerne, of the Emperours gracious fauour, and to put them all out of feare, cauſed letters of generall pardon to bee publiſhed, for all men to take knowledge of: the purport whereof was this.

Wee George Baſta Countie of Huſt and Marmar, Lord of Sult, Knight, Counſellour to his Imperiall Maieſtie, Gouernour of the Realme of Tranſſiuania, and Lieutenant of the Chriſtian armies of the Emperour, to all Faithfull, lone and greeting. Whereas in this ſo troubleſome a ſtate of things, ſome as well of the Nobilitie as others, in theſe vpper parts of Hungarie, partly of their owne accord, and partly for feare, haue reuolted from his Imperiall Maieſtie, and taken part with the traiterous Haiduckes in their rebellion, to the great preiudice of the Emperour his ſeruice, and the ſtaining of their faith: Wee in the name of his Imperiall and Royall Maieſtie, whome we know to be greatly enclined, and readie to pardon his ſubiects euen of his owne naturall goodneſſe and clemencie, haue by vertue of the full power and authoritie, by his ſaid Imperiall Maieſtie granted vnto vs, giuen free grace and pardon to all them which haue withdrawne themſelues from his obeiſance, or forſaken the ſame, of what order, qualitie, or condition ſoeuer they be, whome wee will receiue into our protection, as void of all crime: and requeſt them, as much as in vs is poſſible, to make their profit of this grace, and to returne vnto their former duty and obeyſance, vnder all aſſurance of impunitie for their forepaſſed faults; and without any ſearch or inquirie to be of the ſame hereafter made, as well for matters of religion, as of State: aſſuring them of their liues, goods, fortunes, dignities, franchiſes, priuiledges, and immunities whatſoeuer, as is more at large declared by his Maieſties letters patents which remaine with vs. And if any letted either with their vrgent affaires, or with ſickneſſe, cannot repaire vnto vs within the day in the ſame letters patents nominated, we will accept of their iuſt excuſes. But if any contrarie to our hope, ſhall vpon any indurat minde, or obſtinat contumacie, faile to repent, and to make their appearance before vs within the day limited, wee denounce them to bee Rebels, ſubiect vnto the paine of rebellion, and ſtained with the note of infamie: pronouncing their liues, their goods, and dignities to be confiſcat and deuolued vnto the Emperour his cofers: for which they ſhall by vs the Chiefetaines, and Captaines of his armies, with all rigour and extreamitie be proſecuted. Proteſting before the Maieſtie of God, before the Maieſtie of the Emperour, and before all Chriſtendome, vs not to be in any ſort culpable of the euills, calamities, and miſeries, which ſhall enſue of the warres and diſaſters which ſuch their rebellion ſhall cauſe: but to be therefrom exempt and acquited, the onely authors of theſe diſorders hauing deſerued theſe imprecations and calamities: vpon the heads of whom wee iuſtly

ly from henceforth lay them, as vpon the miserable authors thereof, by their wickednesse: hauing refused so great grace from the Emperour and vs; vnto all men made knowne by these Presents. e

This Proclamation solemnely by Basta published with the sound of many Drummes and Trumpets, the sixteenth of Ianuarie, and ten dayes libertie giuen for such as would to come in, and againe [illegible] themselues; diuers Gentlemen of the Countrey neere vnto Eperia, where Basta with his armie lay, for feare of being spoiled came in, and accepted of the grace offered: other of the seditious, dwelling farther off, little or nothing at all regarding the same. Insomuch, that the Rebels in number daily increasing, and the rebellion still farther and farther spreading, Botscay was now growne so strong, that hee dismissed from him most part of the Turkes, whose seruice hee had in all these troubles hitherto vsed; reseruing yet certaine Ianizaries, whome he mingled with the garrison of Haiduckes, which he had put into Cassouia. H

Pallas Lippa Botscay beheaded by his commandement beheaded.

Pallas Lippa before by Botscay taken prisoner, and vpon his reuolt from the Emperour, by Botscay made his Lieutenant Generall, and a great man amongst the Rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a most fortunat and happie man. But in the middest of such his happinesse, and the greatnesse of his command, he was by the malice of some, enuying at his estate, accused to Botscay, as if he had had a purpose to haue made him away; and deliuering the strong citie of Cassouia vnto Basta, to haue gone ouer againe vnto the Emperor, and to haue followed his Ensignes. Vpon which suspition he was by the commandement of Botscay beheaded, with fiue other men moe, of good place, suspected to haue beene partakers of the conspiracie with Lippa. In whose treasure, after that he was executed, were found an hundred thousand Hungarian duckats, with seuen hundred chains of gold; all which he had scraped together in that small time wherein he had been Botscay his Lieutenant amongst the Rebels. With which mony Botscay in his rebellion confirmed, became therein more obstinat and furious than before; not admitting any talke with Basta, concerning peace, but vpon such vnreasonable conditions, as best stood with his owne good liking. I

Now long and tedious it were to prosecute euery particular exploit, with the diuers woefull euents thereof, during this so great and dangerous a rebellion in Hungarie; which how heauie so euer they were for the poore Christians there dwelling, to endure, as tending all to the ruine and destruction both of themselues and of their Countrey (sometime one of the most flourishing Kingdomes of Christendome, but now become as it were a large Theatre, for all the World to behold most rufull tragedies, and bloudie massacres acted in) yet for all that vnto some nothing is pleasant but what is written of the greatest actions; as of great and bloudie battels, of the conquest of whole Kingdomes, and the ruine of most mightie and famous Princes; all other things else being vnto them tedious. In some part to ease them of such wearinesse, and to please their appetites, I will briefly passe ouer, and euen lightly touch such things as for the most part of this yere passed in this troublesome country, not staying but vpon matters of greatest weight and importance. The Haiduckes still proceeding in their rebellion, in the beginning of Februarie besieged the Castle of Sacmar, a place very fit for their purpose: which Castle the souldiers there in garrison doubting to be able to hold against them (being not past threescore sound men left in it) and destitute also of their necessarie prouision, couenanting to haue their liues spared, at length yeelded vnto them. But in going thence, meeting with certaine other companies of Haiduckes neere vnto Tokay, they were by them most part of them slaine, some few of them by speedie flight escaping. The same Haiduckes which had taken Sacmar, immediatly after attempted to haue surprised the towne and castle of Tokay also: But the Gouernour of the place in good time aduertised of their intent and purpose, caused the yce wherewith the riuer was hard frosen, to be broken fortie paces ouer, neere vnto the castle, and the same to be lightly couered ouer with straw. Whither the Haiduckes comming by night, and finding the yce on the other side, the riuer, whereunto they first came, strong enough to beare them, by heapes thrusting one another forward, to haue scaled the castle, the yce breaking vnder them, they there together by heapes most miserably perished, many of the rest which escaped that danger, being with shot out of the castle slaine also. In this castle was no great store of victuals: whereof Basta vnderstanding, with his armie marched from Eperia toward Bodac, a towne holden by the Rebels, K L M

The castle of Sacmar yeelded to the Haiduckes

Tokay in vaine attempted to haue beene surprised by the Haiduckes.

A Rebels, in hope with the spoile thereof to haue relieued Tokay. But the Rebels hearing of his comming, hauing themselues burnt the town, had got themselues with that they had, into the castle, and from thence with their great ordnance so welcomed Basta at his comming, that disappointed of his purpose, and hauing lost some of his men, he was glad with all speed (not hauing stayed aboue foure houres) to returne againe to Eperia: certaine of the nobilitie of that country, which tooke part with the Rebels, being reported, in his absence, to haue made a road towards Eperia, to the endangering of that citie. In which his return towards Eperia, the troups of Countie Turon, and of Charles Collonitz, by chance lighting vpon 500 Haiducks in a country village, set the same on fire, and therein burnt most of the said Rebels, and slew the rest of them that remained, in seeking by flight to haue saued themselues.

B In the meane time one of the great men amongst the Turkes came to Cassouia, bringing with him a great sum of money, which being diuided amongst the Rebels there, much confirmed them both in their rebellion, and deuotion toward the Turks; which rebellion they spared not for any cost by all meanes to maintaine, as more preuailing thereby, than by the greatest forces they could vse for the conquering of Hungarie.

But Basta was no sooner with his army returned againe to Eperia, but that the souldiers generally exclaiming, and calling vpon him for their pay, were about in a mutinie to haue forsaken him. For the appeasing of which tumult, he was glad presently to make what shift he could for money, wherewith hee in some measure gaue them contentment, and so with much adoe, agreed with them for six weekes seruice longer: thereby deliuering the citisens of Eperia C from a great feare, wherein they were, for being spoiled by those mutinous soldiers, of whom they stood in no lesse doubt than they did of their enemies.

Basta his soldiers in mutinie for their pay.

And now the seditious Haiducks after their wonted manner still roaming vp and down the vpper part of Hungarie, the second day of march, about seuen of the clocke in the morning came to Newsoll, a faire in that countrey, and there by many reasons perswading the citisens to reuolt, and to take part with them, had parley with them vntill it was full twelue of the clocke; but drawing still neerer and neerer vnto the towne. Insomuch that Turbelius Gouernor of the place, perceiuing a yeelding inclination in the citisens, and doubting without their helpe to be able to defend so great a citie against the Haiducks, with so weake a garrison as he then had therein, he with his Cossackes, for his more safetie retired himselfe into the Castle. D Which done, the Haiduckes forthwith breaking into the citie with six companies, summoned the castle, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto them. Of whom Turbelius slew diuers with shot out of the Castle: and the same day in the euening couragiously sallying out of the Castle, with certaine companies of harquebusiers, draue the Haiducks againe out of the Citie; which he afterward better fortified against their like attempts. And the next day vnderstanding by a countreyman, That certaine companies of Haiduckes and Turkes together, were comming to Turtzo, a town not far off, carrying with with them a great number of cattel, women and children, which they had got out of the countrey townes and villages thereabout: hee presently sent forth his Lieutenant against them, with his Cossackes (a desperat kinde of horsemen) who meeting with these Haiducks and Turks, slew of them about 150, and recouered from them all the captiues, the cattell, with 200 horses, and a mule loaded with 4000 E Hungarian duckats.

Newsoll surprised by the Haiducks, and againe recouered from them.

Now had Filek (a most beautifull castle, and as it were the key of that part of the vpper Hungarie, which the Christian Emperour yet held against the Turkes) for certaine moneths been hardly besieged by the Haiducks: which although it was so well stored with victuals, and other necessarie prouision, as that it might haue holden out three months longer siege, yet the souldiers there in garrison, for want of water were enforced now at length to yeeld the same. For the keeping of which castle Redeius Ferentsius, captaine of the Haiducks which had woon it, placed therein a garrison, part Haiducks, part Turks: as not daring to trust either of them alone; the Haiducks for feare of their trecherie; nor the Turks, for that he knew them F to be desirous of the place, for the commodious scituation thereof, as giuing them a way to enter farther into the territories of the Christians: which Redeius, though a Rebell, would not yet in any sort grant them.

Filek yeelded vnto the Haiducks

This castle of Filek so (as is before said) besieged, the valiant Collonitz had oftentimes in vaine sought to haue relieued; all the waies being so beset, and as it were, fortified with the infinit

Turkes, Tartars, and Rebels, as that there was no comming vnto it: and that part of his owne fouldiers being Haiducks also, to whom he durst not well trust, for feare of being betrayed by them. Concerning which matters, he shortly after writing to a certaine nobleman, after that he had likewee vnto him, That he desired nothing more of the Emperor, then to be discharged of his seruice, he thus breaketh forth.

The letter of Collonitz vnto a certaine nobleman, concerning the vnfaithfulnesse of the Rebels in Hungarie.

Strong townes and places in the Turkes and rebels hands on the vpper Hungarie.

Now if Collenitz one of the greatest and best Commaunders of the Emperours forces against the Turkes in Hungarie, was thus beset, and spoyled of his substance, by the rebels, as he in these his letters complayneth, and as indeed he was, hauing at one time receiued from them so great harme, as was deemed to haue amounted to an hundred thousand Dackats; and not daring to trust his owne Hungarian souldiers, whose hearts hee knew to be with the Rebels: In what state may the rest of the people of that distressed Prouince, be thought to haue beene, beeing at the same time exposed vnto the same Rebels as a prey and spoyle, and their countrey layed open for the Turkes and Tartars to forrage and ouerrunne at their pleasure.

Wigiase in vain attempted to haue been surprised by the Haiduckes.

But in briefe, to run along with the Haiduckes, foure thousand of them attempting to haue surprised Wigiase, were so from thence repulsed, as that many of them being there slaine, fiue and thirtie wagons were scarce sufficient to carry the rest of the wounded ouer the mountains, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence, they brake into Turson his country: where they hauing rifled all the townes and villages, commanded all the States of the countrey, within three daies next after, to submit themselues to Botscay, and to sweare vnto him fealty; or otherwise to expect all extremities: who with feare dismaied, all promised to submit themselues vnto Redeius, Botscay his Lieutenant.

Now for remedie of these euils, Napragius and Forgatius, two graue counsellors, were sent in the Emperours name, to entreat of peace with Botscay: who the seuen and twentieth of March departing from Eperia, with foure score harquebusiers towards Cassouia, before they came thither, sent before them an herauld, to aduertise Botscay of their comming. Which messenger, so soone as hee was come into Cassouia, the Turkes so straitly kept, as that no man might speake with him but Botscay himselfe; and not he also, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turkes. Who at his first meeting with him, told him, That if the Embassadours from whome he came, were sent from the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, they should bee right welcome vnto him, and haue audience: but if they came from the Emperour, as had Rogatius and Ciaccius before sent from Basta, they should then spare their labour, and come no farther: for that all matters had with him beene often enough talked vpon; it beeing now more than time, that things so often consulted vpon, should bee no more talked talked of, but indeed performed. Which messenger returning vnto the Embassadours, told them what Botscay had said, and that the Haiducks had in Cassouia built a bulwarke of a wonderfull height, beset the gates with strong guards, and so filled the trenches with souldiours, that a man could hardly enter into the citie; howbeit that euery man might safely come and go thither about his trade and businesse. He told them also, how that Botscay his Lieutenant had called together all the gouernors of the places thereabout, and aduised them for the space of fourteene dayes to beware of the excursions of the Haiducks, and in the mean time, for their more safetie, to bring their wiues and children, with such other things as they made most reckoning of, into the citie, for that he could not as yet (as he said) represse the vnruly and headstrong Haiducks, being yet in their rage and furie, as the manner of the discontented multitude is. Of which Haiducks, some going forth toward Newhuse, and bringing home a great booty of cattell, were by Collonitz and Trautmanstorf, pursuing them with their horsemen, ouerthrowne, and all the bootie againe recouered.

Botscay about this time, viz. the nine and twentieth day of March, summoned all the Nobilitie and States of Hungary vnto an assemblie to be holden at Serentium the seuenteenth day of Aprill, writing vnto them in this sort:

Botscay his letters to the Nobilitie & states of Hungarie, to call them together to Serentz

You know (said he) right worthie and valiant men, into what extreame miseries our afflicted countrey (all the antient priuiledges and immunities thereof being contemned and troden vnder foot) is by the comming in of strangers brought: whose insolencie is gone so farre, that we cannot only not quietly possesse our owne goods, but so much as enioy the libertie of our owne consciences. For which cause the Nobilitie of the whole kingdome being the last yeare sent in embassie, and as it were foreseeing what was to come; the assemblie of the Empire being ended, openly protested before the whole Imperial Diet, and by their letters oftentimes declared, that they should of necessitie be at length enforced to take vpon themselues the defence of their priuiledges and of their Religion: by which their protestation for all that, they so little preuailed, that forthwith after, such an intollerable Edict was by the Emperours commandement published, as had exposed vs all and euery one of vs to most certaine death, had we not betime prouided for our selues. All which things are vnto you all most certainly knowne, both by the vnlawfull Acts themselues, and the whole proceeding of the Pronost General. All which things considered, you met together at Galest, and from thence againe openly signified vnto the aforesaid Pronost General (vnto whom his Imperial Maiestie had committed the shedding of our bloud, the abolishing of our priuiledges and Religion, viz. the execution of this cruel Edict) that if he proceeded to go forward in that businesse, you would put into execution what you had before publiquely protested, in the general assemblie of the whole Empire at Presburg. But what answer you receiued from him, forasmuch as it is not vnto any of you vnknowne, it is not needfull here to rehearse. Wherefore when as he going about the execution of the aforesaid Edict, did in forcible manner with certaine pieces of great ordnance impugne the Armie of his Imperial Maiestie, both in his and our dread Lord and Soueraigne, and by force tooke from vs some of our castles, and besieged some others; we found no other remedie against these so great euils, but that which God himselfe euen then shewed vnto vs, which was, by force of armes to defend our selues so far as we might. In which our purpose seeing that the grace of God, and the good successe which we haue hitherto had, will vs to continue, although we haue suffered no little harme from the Germanes and Haiducks (which for all that, is for the recouerie of the libertie of our countrey, patiently to be borne) to the intent that we vnited with other our brethren through Hungarie, may the better withstand our enemies, and fight against them; it is most necessarie that we should meet together, and all matters set apart, enter into consultation, how hereafter to resist our enemies, and set our countrey in peace and quietnesse. Wherefore seeing that we haue determined to hold an assemblie at Serents the 17 day of Aprill, wee by these Presents warn and request you al, there at the aforesaid 17 day of April to make your personal appearance, to ioyn in amity with vs, and after Gods name called vpo, to consult and conclude vpon such things as may be both acceptable and pleasing vnto God, and most profitable and necessarie for the good of our afflicted countrey in general. But if there shall be any which vpon a presumptuous or carelesse contempt shall not at the time appointed come, nor seeme to regard such things as so much concerne the common good and welfare of their native Countrey; let them assuredly know, both themselues to be therefore to be accounted for enemies vnto their Countrey, and their goods also so to be disposed of, as shall vnto the Nobilitie and States then and there assembled, be thought meet and conuenient.

Concerning which matters, [illegible] noble man, after that he had shewed vnto him, That he desired [illegible] than to be discharged of his charge, he thus breake in forth: [illegible]

I cannot [illegible] open mine

[illegible] they quieted

[illegible] Basta the Generall [illegible] many inuectiues and despightfull reproches, with [illegible] the spoyle of certain carriages loded [illegible] and so marching thorow the countrey toward Presburg. [illegible] cruelties by killing and spoiling whatsoeuer came in their way, [illegible] people as they went, worse and more inhumane than the very [illegible] where amongst other the prey [illegible] them take [illegible] were verie great, they carried away with them toward Presburg aboue ten thousand oxen and two thousand [illegible] threatening by the way as they went, to burne the suburbs of the citie so soone as they came thither, if they were not forthwith payed their pay: whereupon many of the Citizens for feare forsooke their dwellings, and remooued to Vienna.

Newsol taken by the Haiducks

But the Rebels on the other side hauing (as is before declared) in vaine attempted to haue taken Newsol, being forthwith dr[illegible] of it againe, assembling themselues in great number, came now againe and besieged it, [illegible] the sixteenth day of Aprill tooke it, to the great and incomparable losse of the citizens: other of their fellowes in other places hauing but the day before taken Cibinium, Portfeld, Schemnitz, with some other places also.

The miserable estate of Hungarie through mutinie discord.

Thus while the Haiduckes at their pleasure on the one side spoile the vpper part of Hungarie, and the Emperours souldiers on the other side for want of pay do therein no lesse harme than they, as enemies rifling and ransacking euery corner of the counirey [illegible] they went, the poore husbandmen dwelling here and there, dispersed abroad in the countrey, for feare leauing their homely dwellings with such things as they had, fled some of them into Polonia, other some into the mountaines, where many of them perished with hunger; the poore husbandman not daring now to go forth to till his land, neither the sheepheard to feed his flocke, all places being filled with miserie, mourning, and heauinesse; the Turkes and Tartars, the common enemies of the Christians, being not the causers thereof, but euen the Christians themselues, one of them euen with greedinesse seeking the ruine and destruction of another; as commonly it falleth out in kingdomes and States diuided.

Morauia spoyled by the rebel Dom Haiducke.

Neither did these so great troubles, the ground of so many miseries, containe themselues within the bounds of Hungarie onely, but brake out into other countries and prouinces thereunto adioyning also; but especially into Morauia, into which Countrey the Haiduckes breaking, miserably spoyled the same, by force tooke certaine townes, which they robbed and rifled, carrying away with them euen the verie little children, take nfrom their heauie parents, to be sould afterwards vnto the Turks: a miserable kind of merchandise, and of all Christians to be

A be detested. For remedie of which mischiefes, by sufferance still more and more encreasing, Lichtenstein Gouernor of the country hauing raised all the power that he was able for to make, went against them, and with much ado at length draue them out of the countrey, with fire and sword now by them most grieuously spoiled: they for all that carrying away with them a great part of the wealth of that countrey, with foure thousand captiues, all by them appointed vnto the Turks slauerie.

About this time also Basta lying at Presburg, and vnderstanding that fourteene thousand Turks and Tartars being come to S. Georges, six thousand of them were gon ouer the Danubius, about a mile beneath Presburg, to the end that whilest they were making a road into Austria, the rest in the meane time might proue their forces vpon Presburg; with his horsemen
B followed after them himselfe, to cut off such straggling companies of them, as otherwise might haue done great harme abroad in the countrey, leauing behinde him in Presburg but three hundred Wallon horsemen, with certaine companies of footmen for the keeping of the citie. Which three hundred horsemen being verie good and expert souldiers, and desirous to be doing something, by night made a road out of the citie, toward S. Georges, where the rest of the Haiducks and Turks in great securitie lay; vpon whom these resolute men vpon the sudden falling, brought a great feare vpon the whole campe, and hauing slaine of them aboue fiue hundred before the rest could arme themselues, returned with a great victorie, though but with small prey, carrying with them some few horses of seruice to Presburg: where by that they had done it was reasonably thought, that had they been but a thousand strong, they C had discomfited the enemies whole campe.

A notable exploit by a few performed.

In the meane time they of the garrison of Comora vnderstanding that Begedes Bassa was determined with a notable conuoy to go from Buda with seuenteene waggons loaded with money and other things of great value, to Boiscay the Rebell and the Tartar Cham his sonne, who with certaine thousands of Tartars was come to Solnok, to the aid of Boiscay and the Rebels: they in hope of so great a bootie lay in wait for him vpon the way whereby hee must needs passe, and at his comming set vpon him, and slew a number of his men; amongst whom it fortuned the Bassa himselfe to be slaine, shot in the breast with a small shot whilest hee was mounting vp his horse: whose dead bodie the Turks about him hauing taken vp, and there-
D by speedie flight escaping. Here were also all the aforesaid waggons taken, with an exceeding rich bootie; all which the garrison souldiers, well worthie thereof, carried away with them to Comora, together with the Bassa's head, strucke from his bodie with his owne scimitar: which scimitar, with the Bassa's rich coat, Pogranius the gouernor of Comora afterward sent as a Present to the Emperor at Prague. This Bassa while he liued was a most craftie and subtil man, the chiefe plotter and author of all the late troubles in Hungary, hauing before put all Transyluania into most dangerous stirs and tumults, & greatly confirmed Boiscay in his rebellion: he spake the Hungarian language naturally, and was therein verie eloquent, which serued him to great purpose both for the raising and maintaining of the rebellion both in Transyluania and in Hungarie. Which so dangerous a man taken out of the way, many were in E good hope of some good end to be made of these ciuile warres, more dangerous vnto the state of both these afflicted Countreys, than were the great and puissant armies of the Turks, which were almost euerie yeare in the heart of the one or of the other of them to bee seene.

Begedes Bassa slaine.

The name of the Germanes odious vnto the Hungarians.

Now was the rebellion growne so great in Hungarie, and the Rebels so strong, that euen the verie name of the Germans was become vnto the Hungarians both odious and contemptible: insomuch that Basta offering to haue put new supplies of German souldiors into the Citie of Tyrna, then in danger of the Haiducks; the Gouernours of the place not onely refused to receiue them, but also to let them haue any thing of them for their readie money, saying, That they had Citizens ynow in the Citie to defend the same against their enemies, and that F therefore as they needed not of the helpe of the Germanes, so they would haue nothing to do with them. And yet as soone as Redeius, Boiscay his Lieutenant, was with his Armie come thither, they without more ado opened vnto him the gates of the citie, and receiuing him in, were about to haue slaine all the Germanes there dwelling amongst them, being well neere a third part of the Inhabitants; and had so done, but that some wiser than the rest, considering that that the Germans hauing there long dwelt, were by often marriages joyned in affinitie with the Hungarians, and the Hungarians with them, otherwise perswaded them, left in so doing they might seeme to be cruell against their owne blood. And so the matter being referred to Zacdin himselfe, it was by him by the counsel of one of the greatest men of the Turks, ordered, That the Germans should be spared their liues, so that from thenceforth they should no more vse the German but the Hungarian apparell and attire; onely the German armyre being taken away for the Germans themselues.

The Germans by the Turkes perswaded to put on Hungarian garments.

Great townes burnt and razed by the rebels in Hungarie.

But to proceed with these troubles according to the course of the time and of the yeare, about the twentie fourth of May the Turkes and Tartars joyning their forces with the Rebels, burnt fourteene country villages about the lake of Neusidler, and as many moe in other places also towards Neustat, leauing behinde them most lamentable remembrances and testimonies of their barbarous and inhumane crueltie, hauing put most of the women and children to the sword, and impaled diuers vpon stakes, carrying the men away with them as captiues, and the beasts and cattell as a prey; and so leauing the country as they went almost desolate, scarce any being therein left to bewaile the miseries thereof. And about the end of this same moneth the rebels surprised Simega, Grotta, and Coppernacum, and a little while after, Gintzam: all which places they rifled and spoyled, as they did also Hogengoa, a great towne of the Lord Lichtenstein; and Niderspringa a Towne of Collonitzes, which they first rifled, and afterward burnt: and with the terrour of this their dealing enforced all the Country thereabout both farre neere to yeeld vnto them; onely Altsoll and Cheinnitz, who continued in their loyaltie, and standing fast for the Emperour, did the Rebels much harme.

The Haiduckes and Turkes encounter at Presburg by the rebels.

About the beginning of Iune certaine companies of Turkes and Haiduckes mingled together, came againe, as they had before done, to Presburg: Of whose comming the Gouernor of the citie hauing aduertisement, with three troupes of Wallon horsemen, and certaine companies of harquebusiers, breaking out of the Citie, caused them forthwith to retyre: which the Wallon horsemen seeing, to preuent them in their retreat, fetching a compasse about, met with them when they thought themselues past all danger, and falling vpon them, slew of them fiue hundred, and draue the rest into Danubius; so that of all those Turks and Haiduckes none escaped but onely foureteene, amongst whom three Turkes and one fugitiue Citisen of Presburg were found, whom together with a great spoyle, the garrison soldiers carried backe with them into the citie.

Vesprinium yeelded vnto the Rebels.

At the selfe same time the Citisens of Vesprinium fauouring the proceedings of the Haiduckes, rose themselues in rebellion against the Emperour, and taking the Captaine of the castle, together with his Lieutenant and the keyes of the Castle, caused them to be carried to Redeium, Botscay his Lieutenant; yeelding themselues into his protection. Of which reuolt of the citie the Turks tooke exceeding pleasure, and forthwith sent newes thereof vnto the Sultan, wishing him to hast the comming of his Armie, for that the passages were now layed open vnto his further conquest; and further aduising him still more and more to encourage Botscay in his rebellion.

Stiria and Austria spoyled by the Rebels.

And now was Hungarie too little, or els too bare to containe and satisfie the still encreasing Rebels, who in great number breaking into Stiria (as they had before done on the other side of Hungarie into Morauia) did therein great harme, wasting and spoyling all before them as they went; insomuch that Countie Serin, the Lord Nadasti, and Budian, all right worthie men, and such as heretofore had done great things against the Turkes, for the Christian Commonweale, seeing themselues and all that they had in danger to be spoyled, being themselues not able to withstand the Rebels, nor any other stay whereon to rest, submitted themselues vnto Botscay, as did many other Noblemen of that Country also. Out of Stiria the Rebels made head into Austria, and there roaming vp and downe the Country, did like harme.

Thus was the state of Austria and Hungarie at this time most miserable, which for that it is so well set downe in certaine letters by a graue and vnderstanding Citisen of Vienna, who was himselfe an eye-witnesse of most part thereof, as that it cannot well better be expressed; I haue thought it good to refer the report thereof vnto the letters themselues.

The miserable troubles of Hungarie and Austria notably described by the letters of a citisen of Vienna.

All Austria (saith he) is full of miserie and calamitie. From out of the Castle and Bulwarkes here at Vienna, a man may sometime at once behold fifteene townes and villages all on fire in the Countrey hereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turkes, and partly by our owne mutinous souldiours. Odenburg is yet besieged, and the Haiducks haue forraged the Countrey as farre Hinberg: whom had not the Regiment of Collonitz repressed, these our suburbs of Vienna had now beene taken, ransacked, and burnt. Neustat is on euery side besieged by the Enemie; all the Villages about Vienna, as farre as Dresskirc are with fire destroyed: they of Newstat went about to haue cut off some part of the Enemies Forces, but with euill successe, hauing lost aboue fiftie of their owne men. Brunna and Entzendorfe are also with fire consumed: The Wallons lye incamped at Miedling, most miserably spoiling the country People of all that they had: The Haiduckes hauing by night surprised the great Towne of Altenbourg, and from thence carrying a great prey, haue burnt it: The Castle had endured the like fortune, had not an hundred Harquebusiers, that were by chance come thither holpen to defend it. Sixe thousand of the enemies lie about Visselbourg, but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing against them or no, it is greatly doubted. Presburg is also in great danger; for the Garrison souldiours there doe threaten the cruell spoyle of the Citisens, and all extremities, if by a certaine day they receiue not their Pay: who if they shall depart thence, there is no doubt but that the Haiduckes will forthwith succeed them in their places. These men indeed doe presend Religion, but what louers they be thereof, the late example of a Minister by them most cruelly tormented, not farre from Cobbelsdorfe, doth manifestly shew. The report is, That the Vayuod of Valachia doth fauour neither part: into which Prouince a great number of Tartars are come in the aid of Botscay. All the Market places and streets heere in this Citie, lie full of poore fugitiue creatures of all sex and ages; a most miserable sight to behold. Our owne mutinous souldiours beset all the wayes to the Citie, and exclude vs from all manner of victuall; and not to vse many words, in crueltie and hostilitie almost exceed the verie Enemies. The Hungarian Rebels, who of late forraged Austria, haue carried away with them aboue eight thousand head of cattell, which, together with the Prisoners by them taken, they haue sent into Turkey. The little boyes and children, which cannot by reason of their tender yeares goe, they carrie along with them vpon horses, whose pittifull mourning and lamentation might moone euen the verie stones; and yet are they (inhumane men) no whit mooued: yea many of these poore soules are heere and there by the way found dashed against the ground, with their braines beaten out. And these Rebels in their behauiour shew such crueltie, as whereat the verie Turkes themselues were amazed. All things about Isenstad are by the Enemies taken and carried away. They of Neuhuse, besieged by thirtie thousand of their Enemies, haue hitherto played the men, and of late repulsed the second assault, with much slaughter of their Enemies. They say, That two thousand Tartars, as many Rebels, and thirteene thousand Turks, are to be yet expected to come vnto the Campe at Neuhuse, who if they shall chance to come, it can scarce be, that they of Neuhuse can long well hold out against them, especially being not well appointed of necessarie prouision. The report is, That hauing taken Neuhuse, they will remoone to Strigonium. It is said also, twelue thousand Turkes to haue now passed ouer the bridge at Essec; and great supplies both of men and money to come to Botscay, who lieth encamped about Eperia, and is said to haue made a couenant with the Great Sultan, That what place soeuer either of them should first take, he should hold the same wholly vnto himselfe. Tanhuser, who of late was Gouernour of Filek, is now (as the report goeth) of counsell with Botscay. Germenchius hath put in three moneths victuall into Hust in Transyluania. God in his mercie behold our poore afflicted and distressed Country.

Thus far he: Whereby the Reader (as I suppose) may easily gather, the miserable estate of both the countries of Hungarie and Austria, the Christians themselues being the chiefe Authors thereof.

Odenburg besieged by the rebels, and by Basta relieued.

The rebellious Haiduckes had hitherto most straightly besieged the Citie of Odenburg, hauing assaulted it in fiue sundrie places at once: vpon whom Trautmanstorfe, Generall of the Garrison there, causing part of his horsemen to sallie forth, skirmished with them from eleuen of the clocke in the forenoone, vntill two of the clock in the afternoone, at which time while the Haiducks beginning to preuaile, the Gouernour with the rest of his horsemen, certaine enfignes of footmen, with some of the citizens, with three field peeces vpon the walles beholding fast of the fight, discomfited the Haiduckes, put them to flight, and slew many of them, hauing taken from them twelue enfignes, with many prisoners, whom he him into the citie. Of which ouerthrow the Haiducks desirous to be reuenged, w mewed forces shortly after returned again vnto the city, burnt the suburbs of the same, and led the villages thereabout. But whilest they thus lay about Odenbourg, Bassa small power drawing neere vnto them, they presently rose, and passing ouer the carried away with them two thousand head of cattell, with a great number of Ch captiues.

The Turkes being not to learne to make vse of the discord of the Christia selues, had oftentimes been in hand with Botscay, to deliuer Cassouia wholly
Of which strong citie, being the best that the Christians now held in the vpper Turkes were most desirous, both for the commodious scituation thereof, and they deemed themselues partly thereof alreadie possessed, some good part of the garri therein being Turkes, as well Ianizaries as others. The full possession of which the better to obtaine from Botscay, and to get it into their owne hands, they sent vnto three waggons loaded with money and other rich commodities for a Present, and to his wants, by a good conuoy of foure hundred Haiducks and some Turks joyned vnto them.
Which Haiducks as they were by the way to Cassouia, to passe by Tockay, a strong towne holden by the Christians, gaue secret knowledge vnto comming that way, and that if he would receiue them into the towne, and so into his protection, they would with some small helpe from him, deliuer into his hands that so rich a bootie, and so continue with him as his faithfull and trustie souldiours. Of whose offer the Gouernor well assured, forthwith sent forth foure hundred of the souldiours of his owne garrison to meet them, who joyning with the aforesaid Haiduckes which came with the conuoy, set vpon the Turks which came with them, and slew them euery mothers sonne: and so with the rich booue were by the Gouernour receiued into the towne, and by him courteously entertained: where they had not long lien, but that after their woonted manner looking into the country, they chanced to meet with certaine companies of Botscay his men, with whom they encountering, and hauing slaine of them neere about fiue hundred, tooke from them seuen waggons loded with good prouision, and thirtie horses, beside much other rich spoile.

But the Rebels, notwithstanding th and such other losses, encreasing both in number and power, still more and more in all places preuailed, but especially in the vpper part of Hungarie, the townes there one after another dayly reuolting vnto them, as amongst the rest the strong towne of Totisa did; whereinto the Rebels entering, sent from thence part of the great ordnance, together with Relinger a Germane Captaine Gouernour of the Towne, and certaine other Germane souldiours there taken, vnto Redeim, Botscay his Lieutenant, then lying with a great armie of thirtie thousand Hungarian Rebels and Turkes, at the siege of the strong towne and castle of Newhuse. Which as it had oftentimes by him beene sharpely assaulted, so was it by the souldiours therein most notably defended; protesting neuer to yeeld the same, but to hold it out euen to the last man therein to be left aliue. Which caused Redeim for the encouraging of his souldiours, (who had now lien there certaine moneths at the siege thereof) to promise vnto them the whole spoile of the towne, and of all that therein was. And yet for all that, oft times kept backe the Turks from assaulting the same, for feare lest if they should by force haue taken it, they would by force also haue holden it vnto themselues, as a place for them most commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the vpper part of Hungarie: which hee, though one of the greatest Rebels, was yet loth to haue it to fall into their hands; and yet himselfe with the Haiduckes the Hungarian Rebels, afterward, viz. the 25 of Iuly, gaue thereunto a most furious assault, insomuch that hauing aduaunced ten of their Enfignes to the top of the Rampiers, they were in great hope euen presently to haue taken it, but yet were by the resolute valour of the defendants notably repulsed, and enforced againe to reti , leauing behinde them aboue seuen hundred of their most forward men

dead in the trenches. Vnto which siege the Bassa of Agria came also afterward with three thousand horsemen and a number of Ianizaries; so that the besieged, partly with mynes, partly with shot and often assaults distressed, were so wasted and wounded, that there were scarcely two hundred whole and sound men left in the whole garrison: beside that, both victuals and pouder begun now to grow scarce also, so that they were brought vnto such extremity, as that well they could not be in worse case: and yet armed with a constant resolution, they seemed not to be any thing therewith danted or discouraged, but still valiantly held it out. Newhuse distressed.

The Hungarians dwelling in the Isle of Shut in the riuer of Danuoius, hauing before submitted themselues vnto the Rebels, did with their helpe much trouble the passages vnto the towne of Rab and Comara, and the Citie of Strigonium; vnto whome certaine messengers were sent on the Emperours behalfe to persuade with them to forsake the Rebels and to returne againe vnto their antient obedience. Who so well vsed the matter with them, that taking a truce for eight dayes, they in the meane time sent fiue of the chiefe men amongst them by ship to Presburg, offering vnto the Gouernour there, That if they might be secured of their goods and safetie, and that the Haiduckes that were with them might be entertained in pay, they would be readie againe to take the oath of allegeance and faithfully to serue him as became his loyall subiects and valiant soldiers: and for the assurance thereof, to leaue their wiues and children as pledges at Presburg. Which their offer was vnto the Gouernour very acceptable and welcome, who yeelding vnto their request, in friendly sort dismissed them. But they being returned home, and hauing declared to the rest of their fellowes what they had done; it was by generall consent agreed, that foure thousand of them should ioyne themselues vnto the Emperours power vnder the Regiment of Collonitz, who to bee knowne from others, wore in their crests certaine speciall feathers; their wiues and children being carried to Presburg as pledges of their faith: but this agreement by them made with the Gouernor of Presburg beeing once knowne, the rest of the Rebels in the Countrey thereabout together assembled with the Turkes, inuaded the Isle, in hope vpon the sudden to haue surprised them: but deceiued of their expectation, were by the inhabitants of the Isle, and by the helpe of certaine Germane troupes ouerthrowne and put to flight, and three thousand of them there slaine. The Rebels in the Isle of Shut submit themselues againe vnto the Emperour.

About the beginning of Iuly certaine Commissioners were sent on the Emperours behalfe to Cossouia, to intreat with Botscay concerning a pacification to be made, who being by him there honourably entertained, and hauing with him stayed almost a whole moneth, were at length the nine and twentieth of the same moneth againe dismissed. Now the articles, which Botscay propounded vnto these Commissioners to be considered of for the making of a peace, and which for the most part were agreed vpon in the peace afterward concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour, were these.

First, that it should be lawfull for all such as would, to haue the free exercise of the reformed religion. For although (as hee said) he was not ignorant that there was an antient decree amongst the Hungarians, whereby all that professed not the Catholicke Religion, or that reuolted from the same, were to bee burnt, and that hee desired not to haue that article repealed; yet that his request was, That the Emperour hauing regard vnto the troubles of the present time, would promise and assure, That from thenceforth no man should be troubled for his Religion, or called in question for his conscience and Belief. Besides that, he requested to haue the Principalitie of Transyluania during his life; yet with this condition, That after his death it should againe returne vnto the Emperour, so that the Emperor in his absence should appoint a naturall Hungarian to gouerne the same, as also to haue the chiefe gouernment in Hungarie. That there should no more Bishops sit in counsell but one, and that hee, if it should bee so thought meet, should beare the office of the Chancelour. That the liberties and priuiledges of that Kingdome should bee kept whole and inuiolate. That it should be lawfull for him onely to make choice of the chiefe Palatine of the Kingdome. That goods confiscated for any offence committed, should not be dispersed or sold, but giuen to men of desert. That all offenders against the State from thenceforth should bee iudged by the Counsell of Hungarie. That none should bee preferred to Bishoprickes in Hungarie, but such as were of the noble Hungarian bloud. That all iniuries heretofore done should be absolutely pardo- Articles by Botscay propounded vnto the Emperors commissioners for the appeasing of the tumults in the vpper Hungarie.

as they had before vſed, into Hungarie: neither could the Chriſtian Emperour on the other ſide now raiſe ſuch a power as he had in former times done to oppoſe againſt them, and to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themſelues (his greateſt ſtrength in thoſe wars) were now generally reuolted from him, and for moſt part followed the Enſignes of the Rebell Botſcay. The Princes wont to ſend him aid both out of Italie and out of Germanie, now affoorded him little or none at all: and his mercinarie ſouldiers for want of pay were now almoſt euery where vp in mutinie ready to forſake his ſeruice, and to pay themſelues with the ſpoile of his countries euen vnto the gates of Vienna. So that had not the Turkes beene ſo buſied in the Eaſt, but at leiſure to haue turned their whole power into Hungarie, as often times they had before done, it is hardly to be imagined, what ſhould haue letted them to haue ouerrun not onely that which remained of Hungarie, but euen all Auſtria, with ſome good part of Germanie alſo; the Emperours preparations being then ſo ſmall, and his forces ſo weake, as that they were not able to hold the field againſt his own rebellious ſubiects, much leſſe againſt ſo puiſſant and dreadfull an enemie. But God which with his word hath ſet bounds vnto the raging ſea, beyond which it cannot paſſe, and by whoſe power Kings doe raigne and Princes bare rule, had by other meanes auerted the greateſt part of the Turkes forces Eaſtwards: ſo that Serdar Baſſa, Sultan Achmat his Lieutenant Generall for his wars againſt the Chriſtians, came this yeare but with a right ſmall armie (in compariſon of thoſe which the Turkiſh Sultans were woont to ſend) into Hungarie. Howbeit, with ſuch forces as he brought, and with ſuch ſupplies of the Rebels in Hungarie as came vnto him, he being growne fiftie thouſand ſtrong, and out of feare of the Emperours forces, came the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt to Strigonium, and with his armie (part Turks, part Tartars, and part diſloyall Chriſtians) encamped in the ſelfeſame place where the Turks army had but the yeare before lodged, hauing brought with him fortie great pieces of batterie, with all things elſe neceſſarie for the ſiege. Neither were the Turks ſooner encamped, but that the Tartars which came with them to the ſiege (after their wonted manner) more deſirous of prey and booty, than of honor and victory, paſſing ouer the riuer of Gran into the territorie of the Chriſtians, there ſpoiled and burnt all before them as they went.

Strigonium beſieged by the Turkes.

The Turkes make a bridge ouer the riuer of Danubius, to keep Strigonium from being reſcued.

The Turkes in the meane time to depriue the beſieged of all reliefe to be ſent vnto them down the riuer of Danubius, made a great bridge of boats ouer the riuer, well fortified at both ends thereof on each ſide the riuer with a ſtrong Corps de guard for the defence thereof, ſo that nothing could that way paſſe to or from the beſieged citie. Which things much diſmaied them in the citie, ſeeing no preparations to be made on the other ſide for their defence or reliefe: yea Baſſa himſelf, Generall of ſuch ſmal forces as the Emperor had then, ſeeing the enemy ſo ſtrong, and himſelfe ſo weake, began greatly to doubt of the euent of this ſiege: and yet neuertheleſſe reſolutely ſet downe to employ both his valour and his wiſedome for the ſafegard of the place, he during the time of the ſiege failed not to the vttermoſt of his power to ſhew the effects both of the one and of the other.

The Iſle of Strigonium ſpoiled by the Haiducks.

And now the Turks aſſiſted with the Hungarian Rebels, had performed an exploit vpon the Iſle of Strigonium, aſwell to take the ſame from the Imperials, as for the ſpoile and pillage thereof. The inhabitants there had ſtill remained faithfull vnto the ſeruice of the Emperour, whom the Rebels for all that had oftentimes ſought both by force and by perſuaſion to haue remoued from this their loyaltie and iuſt deuoire. Within this Iſle were 200 Haiduckes, returned againe to the Emperors ſeruice, who were ioined vnto the Iſlanders, for the better defence both of them and of the Iſland. But the Rebels knowing well the paſſages and entrances into the Iſle, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the ſame, and in it theſe poore Haiducks, whom they cut all in pieces: which loſſe cauſed Baſſa to reſolue to ſend the Wallons he had in his army into the Iſle for the defence thereof. Which they of the Iſland vnderſtanding, made requeſt vnto the Generall, That he would not in any wiſe ſo doe, for that they greatly feared leſt the Wallons, beeing men altogether giuen to the ſpoyle, not finding the Rebels to prey vpon, ſhould after their woonted manner prey vpon them, the Emperours faithfull ſubiects. At whoſe inſtance the former purpoſe for the ſending of the Wallons beeing changed, Collonitz himſelfe was appointed vnto that ſeruice; with whome Monſieur de Laual, a noble young Gentleman of France (who but a few dayes before was newly come vnto the campe, for the

the honourable desire he had to see seruice, and to serue himselfe, with his troope of horsemen whome hee had brought with him out of Fraunce) went ouer into the Island also:
Whereinto when as the Rebels shortly after againe entered, they were by Collonitz ouer-throwne and driuen out of the Isle, two hundred and fiftie of them beeing slaine, and aboue fiftie moe of them taken prisoners. In which conflict the noble young Gentleman Laual so brauely behaued himselfe, as that he gained vnto himselfe much honour and renowme, euene mans mouth being full of his prayses, and wondering to see so great courage in so young yeares, hee being then scarce nineteene yeares old. With which losse the Rebels rather enraged than discouraged, shortly after returned againe, in greater number and better re-solued, where betwixt them, and them that were left for the defence of the Island, was fought a more sharpe and bloudie fight than was the former; yet so, as that the Rebels were enforced againe with losse to retire. In which so hot and bloudie a skirmish, Mons. Laual hauing most valiantly borne himselfe against the enemie, and done enough for his [illegible] but not so contented, but carried away with the heat of youth, and the desire of glorie, [illegible] not otherwise to be persuaded, but still aduenturously pressing on the retiring enemie, was there with a small shot slaine, all they which knew him much lamenting his vntimely death. But the Rebels not so discouraged, but still in one place or other inuading the Island, and threatening the Islanders with all extreamities, except they would take part with them; what by force, what by perswasion, so much preuailed with them, that the most part of them reuolting from the Emperour, vpon the sudden set vpon the Count of Rhene, beeing then in the Island, and hauing slaine three hundred of his men, grieuously wounded himselfe also. For the speedie appeasing of which multitude, Basa sent ouer into the Island certaine companies of the Rasians and Wallons, who not regarding that the Islanders were daily damnified by the Rebels, most miserably spoiled them of whatsoeuer the Rebels had yet left them.

The Heiduckes landing in Sirmia, by Collonitz ouerthrowne.

Monsieur Laual slaine.

S. Thomas fort battered and assaulted by the Turks.

The Turkes encamped before Strigonium, first planted their batterie against the strong fort, standing aloft vpon S. Thomas hill: for that from thence they should haue receiued infinit harme, if they should before the winning thereof haue attempted to haue woon the citie; it standing on their backes, and all the plaine betwixt the hill and the citie wherein they were to plant their batterie being subiect vnto it. Which fort, though very strong, they with continuall batterie by the space of almost three weekes, hauing with infinit charge, and the losse of a number of their men, made faultable, the foure and twentith day of September mounted the hill to assault the same. Vnto which assault they went vp the hill so thicke one thrusting an other forward, that the hill seemed now to be nothing but a mount or heape of armed men, scarce any part of it being to be seene, [illegible]as so couered with them. Vpon whom so swarming vp, the Christians in the fort, hauing repo[illegible]all the hope of their welfare in their valour, and resolued thereby to die or liue, couragiously discharged their murthering shot both great and small, scarce any of their deadly bullets falling in vaine. Howbeit the Turkes, resolutely set downe for the performing of that they had taken in hand, without respect of death or danger, came still desperately on, vntill that they were come to the push of pike, and so to handie blowes euen in the verie breaches, which the long furie of the Turks cannon had made verie faultable. Fiue houres this furious assault was by the Turks maintained, and by the Christians with inuincible courage and resolution endured, many braue and valiant men falling on both sides: and thrice the Turkes repulsed, were enforced to retire, but were still by their Commanders brought on againe. The losse was to both sides common, many worthie men there ending their daies, worthie of eternall fame. The Christians fell dead vpon the Turkes slaine by their valor, and the Turks vpon the Christians slaine by their multitude. But what should wee say? The Turkes by numbers died, but not their force, that being by their great numbers still maintained euen in despight of death, and alwaies liuing in their great multitude, yet left aliue. Which was not so with the defendants, but euen quite contrarie; who could not lose one onely man, without diminishing of their forces, and means of resistance: so that they still lost without hope of safegard, and yet could not be in safetie, without continuing of their so great losses. But he that still fighteth onely for to saue his life, without hope of killing of his e-nemie, being too mightie for him to ouercome, must needs at last die ouercome, if it were but with

with verie wearinesse. So in the end of this long and furious assault, nine hundred of the Christians being slaine, together with the Count Oetingen, their Chiefetaine, and his Lieutenant mortally wounded, and nothing now more left but a few sore hurt men, and the dead wals for the Turkes to ouercome, they entered the place, slew those few whome they found yet breathing, made bootie of their death, bloud, and armes; and by the infinite price of their owne bloud, gained that place which had now no more bloud or life left in it. From whence they carried certaine great pieces, to helpe to batter the citie withall, and to vanquish them, for whose defence they were but a little before appointed.

S. Thomas fort woon by the Turkes.

The base town of Strigonium battered.

The Turks hauing thus gained S. Thomas fort, euen as they were yet embrued with bloud, and prickt forward with furie, forthwith planted thirtie great pieces of batterie against the base towne of Strigonium, standing low by the side of Danubius, and commonly called the Water towne; which they with all their force and fury most terribly battered. This base towne was enuironed with a pallisado of wood, to defend it against all sudden surprises, as almost all the townes of Hungarie are: Whereunto the confused multitude of the Turkes carried a number of brush faggots, stuffed with gunpouder and brimstone, which beeing set on fire, presently set fire vpon the pallisado also, and burnt it down to the ground, making a way for the Turks to come euen to the wals of the city; which they with their great ordnance both night and day incessantly most terribly battered, vntill that by the fury of the cannon they had therein made a faire and large faultable breach. A great shame for our men to suffer the same so to be made, and not again repaired: whereas the Turks before in the same place, had made it good against the great armie of the Archduke Matthias, being neuer to be driuen and forced out of it by the Christians valour, vntill they were therein slaine; and to be now by our men through their cowardise not to be able to be made good. For why, it was euen the same place of battell, the same men, the same armes, and the same forme of fight, but not the same courages. The Turks can very well learne of vs that which is for them profitable, & make vse ther-of to their owne aduantage; whereas we can borrow nothing of them to serue vs against them, and so profit our selues by their example. Besides that, the confidence they haue in their multitude carrieth them vnto such aduantages, as from which the despaire of being seconded & relieued keepeth vs: whose boldnesse also firmely grounded vpon a resolution to die, passeth our resolution far, in fighting onely to saue our liues.

The base town of Strigonium assaulted.

The breach so made, the Turks in good order, stayed vpon a firme resolution, came brauely marching on, one of them thrusting another, and as it were striuing among themselues who should haue the honour to giue the first charge, their haughtinesse of minde animating of them to seeke for honour euen where perils were rifest; so to haue the honor to die amongst the most forward and valiant men of war, rather than to liue among cowards of no reputation or valor. During the heat of which their so great and firme a resolution, they regarded not the showers of deadly bullets falling amongst them as thicke as haile, as too weake to dant their haughtie courages; but thrusting one another amidst these so great dangers, came vnto the breach, there to trie the matter hand to hand with our men. The Ianizaries were the men especially appointed to this seruice, and had taken the same vpon them; who with their great muskets on their rests cruelly gauled our men, exposed to the danger of their deadly shot vp-on the brinke as it were of their own graues. The great Bassa himselfe was there present at the assault, encouraging his souldiers with speeches full of terror and of comfort, as he saw occasion for either to be vsed; wherewith he stirred vp their valor as is a ship with a faire or rough gale of wind. Death it selfe could not ouercome these miscreants, their number still repairing in a moment what death had taken away in an houre: whereas our men slew others but to bee slaine themselues; and sought not but to become sacrifices vnto death themselues, and not by their resistance to carrie away the victory against inexorable destinie. The fight was great and terrible, and the bullets still flew, few of them falling in vaine amongst such a multitude and preasse of men. They of the high towne, who themselues expected the like danger wherein their companions now floated betwixt life and death, stood aboue looking on, not daring to giue them aide, or to remoue out of their strength, but reseruing themselues with all their forces for the sole safegard of themselues and for their owne defence. Howbeit all this weaken theirs, whereas it shall destroyed ours, who failed but in number, not in valour, and gaue place but vnto the force of death, and not vnto the force of men. All the deadly blowes appointed to be giuen for the defence of a breach, had been by our men giuen; all the armes necessarie for such a purpose had been employed, all resistance that could be deuised had been made, and all the duties of valiant and worthie men performed; so that nothing here wanted but number, and not valour. But in all such actions there are two things necessarie, the one for the helping of the other, for the correspondencie of their power; which both ioyned in one bodie, may doe all things, but being diuided, can neither of them doe any thing against him which is possessed of both.

Power & valour the gift of great actions.

In fine, after foure attempts in this assault, most of the Christian defendants beeing slaine, the Turks forced the rest, and gained the breach, treading vnder foot the dead bodies both of the Turkes and of the Christians, to get into the Citie. This place thus w[illegible] thole that were left, put to the sword, and the towne rifled; the Turkes yet in breath, [illegible] embrued in bloud, gaue an attempt vnto the high towne, in some hope euen at that time [illegible] so great a confusion of the defendants to haue carried the same also. Howbeit, the defendants beholding their weapons yet dropping with the bloud of their friends and companions, and readie to shed theirs also, for the present notably repulsed them: Who to disappointed of their purpose, and desiring to gaine the place with the least losse they might, resolued to take the same by vndermining of it, reposing more trust in the spade and the mattocke, than in their swords and harquebusies, beeing by experience of their former sieges taught, how hard and dangerous a thing it was by heauerie and assault to obtaine the same. This trauell in the mynes tooke successe according to their desire: for within a few dayes the mynes (with much labour) beeing brought to perfection, and fire put vnto them, they failed not to worke their effect, but with great their violence blew vp the wals, rampiers, men, and munition, altogether, casting foorth such smoakes and flames, as wherewith a number of the defendants were smothered and burnt. Which breaches so made, and the defences of the Citie blowne vp, in such sort, that the Christians lay open to the enemies deadly shot, beeing not able any more to shew themselues without danger of their liues, the Turkes in order forthwith came to assault and force the same. Which the Captaines of the Christians beholding, prepared themselues to withstand them, and to that purpose would haue giuen order vnto their souldiers for the defence both of the breach and of the walles, whome they found such as Eumenes at his greatest need found his, not willing in any wise to fight, and in the most assured perill of death, without courage either to vanquish their enemies, or defend themselues; in such sort, that not one of them would put themselues in order, shew themselues vpon the breach, or come neere the walls. Lazie cowards, chusing rather to attend an assured death in their cowardise and want of courage, than to aduenture their liues into the danger of armes; well deseruing to endure the same with dishonour, seeing that they refused by honourable resistance to preserue their liues. The Captaines for all that by faire speeches and by threats ceased not to stirre them vp; praying, exhorting, and sometime with death threatening them, if they thus refused to doe their duetie, and with their naked swords in their hands would haue enforced them to the breach. But all in vaine; their dead courages beeing not to bee reuiued or stirred vp in their so great a feare of death: Which much dismayed the Captaines, seeing their liues and honour, together with the place (through this tumult and cowardise of their souldiers) to bee in extreame perill. During which time the Turkes comming on, had without any great resistance gained the foot of the breach: whome the souldiers now seeing so neere vnto them, and out of hope to bee relieued, and destitute of courage also, in stead of trusting vnto their armes and valour, betooke themselues vnto the refuge of their shame and cowardise. For compassing in the Count Dampierre, Gouernour of the place, they would by reasons haue perswaded him to haue yeelded, and by threates haue teared him from further resisting of the enemie. Their furie emboldened them, proceeding not from their valour, but from their feare; storming against their Generall for not beeing a coward, as they themselues were; trembling for feare of their enemies, and insulting against him. They had but one man of him to fight against, which made them furious and hardie: hardie with cowardise against one, one, not daring to hold vp their weapons against their enemies being many. Howbeit the Count in the middle of these feares enraged, continued firme in his resolution, his courage encreasing in this storme of mutinie, winning rather to die by the hands of his owne souldiours, in the performing of his dutie, than to be saued by the Turkes in the bottome of his dishonour. Which his so braue a resolution caused him euen in the middest of these furious and tumultuous companies, to put them in minde of their duties, and to perswade with them: That the perill they so much feared, was greater through their owne feare, than indeed it was: that onely their fearefull apprehension made the danger, and not the action that was by them to be performed; seeing that it was impossible for the enemie to ouercome them, if they would but resolutely stand vpon their valour to resist him. That all things resting but in opinion, were by themselues to be subdued, if they had but the desire to ouercome them, and yet of power to ouerthrow them, if they will yeeld to their dishonour. That therefore they should propound vnto themselues the honor and the shame that was to ensue vnto them, by the different deportment of themselues in this action, how much the deformitie of the one differed from the beautie of the other, and aspire vnto the honour which their enemies had sometimes got in the same place, and in the verie same action wherein they were now, for hauing with lesse appearance of their safetie ouercome the like danger, wherein their holding out had made them victorious with honour, without any great fight at all. That it should be an eternall infamie vnto them, that the Turkes should surmount them by their resolution, in an action wherein they ought to shew themselues most valorous; and by their cowardise become subiect vnto them, whome at other times they had accounted vnworthie to be compared with them in valour. That they should lay their hands vpon their hearts, and remember their estate and faith; bound vnto the first by their honour, and to the second by their dutie. That they were men of Warre, liuing by their pay, which bound them to the seruice of him from whom they receiued it, euen vnto death; hauing before obliged their liues vnto their pay: and that they were Christian Subiects, bound to keepe their promise giuen by oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of these things, they depriued themselues of the pay promised to them which performed their seruice, and losing their renowne in this world for their cowardise, and in the world to come for breaking their faith. That therefore they should continue constant in the performance of their dutie, resoluing themselues rather to endure an honorable death, vnto which belonged the recompence of an eternall fame for their valour and fidelitie; than to prolong a miserable life with perpetual infamie for their cowardise: whereof for all that, they could no more assure themselues by the yeelding vp of the place, than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turkes were oft times euen as cruell vpon them that yeelded, as those that resisted; keeping no faith with the Christians, but as best stood with their profit and their pleasure. And that therefore for his part he was resolued, rather to die with honour in the place, than to be beholden to his enemies for an infamous and miserable life. And that therefore he besought them to follow him in this last action of their deuoire, which carried with it all the trophees of their precedent actions, wherein they had oftentimes assisted him in many actions of lesse worth, and of much greater perill.

The braue resolution of Count Dampierre Gouernor of Strigonium.

His notable remonstrances vnto his discouraged soldiers, to perswade them to hold out the siege.

Most shamefull cowardise.

This discourse grounded vpon so good reasons, and proceeding from so great valour, might haue preuailed with any other generous mindes, except with these degenerate souldiours, who by their cowardise had hardened themselues against all the points of honor which might any way moue them; in such sort, that they stood as fast in their base cowardise, as did their General in his valorous and constant resolution. They stood with their hands behinde them, without any weapons in them, as was their mindes without any courage at all: and as men appointed to be sacrificed vpon the altar of death, attending without mouing, but the hands of them that should sacrifice them. Great and shamelesse cowardise, not daring by resistance to withstand the violence of their enemies, for feare of hindering them in their desires, being indeed such as had vowed their death to satisfie their owne furie. Meane while some of these souldiors seeing their speeches to be but vaine, and not able to moue their Gouernour to satisfie their desire, conceiued the same their requests, with the reasons thereof, into writting, which they sent vnto him. Which the Gouernor hauing read, in their sight tore their letters

[illegible] their power, and made the same vnder his feet; reiecting as well their demands by letters, G as also their [illegible] by words. In briefe, hauing forgotten nothing of the dutie of a worthie Generall, and valiant Captaine, ioyned now thereunto the office of a simple Souldiour, going himselfe vnto the breach, with some few, to defend the same. But the more the Captaine shewed [illegible] so great resolution, the more these cowardly and mutinous Villaines proceeded in their base obstinacie, in so much that they fell from prayers, to furie and rage, intreating to deliuer him their Gouernour, together with the place, vnto the Enemie, to saue their liues, if he himselfe would not by treatie saue them from the imminent perils. If these base cowards were before deafe vnto the just remonstrances of their Gouernour, which might haue preserued them from death and infamie, he was also as deafe as they, to conceiue their requests, or to be mooued with their threats; knowing that he had more reason on his side, by constant valour to withstand the wicked and shamefull resolution of [illegible]s, than they had with dishonour to enforce him, or to offer him violence, to their eter[illegible] and infamie. H

In the meane time these obstinate and enraged cowards proceeeded from words to deeds, and from requests to violence, as did oft times the disloyal souldiors of Rome, in slaying their good Emperors. For they in cruel manner, without reuerence, by force layed hands vpon the Gouernor, put him in prison, and afterwards craning parley, fel to treatie with the Great Bassa about the deliuerie vp of the place. Where with the Bassa well contented, sent in vnto them Hali Bassa, to conclude the matter. Where after some little talke, it was agreed, That they should deliuer vp the place (which was not indeed theirs to dispose of) and that the Bassa should therefore promise and suffer them with bag and baggage in safetie to depart whither they would, with their ensignes frilled vp, and fire in their matches; leauing behinde them their great ordnance, with all their other munition and warlike prouision. Which only composition by the perfidious souldiors made in the absence and indurance of their General, was by the Turks faithfully kept, amongst a thousand others like before by them broken: whether it were in respect of the easie conquest of the citie, (being one of the chiefe and principal places of all Hungary) or for that they being ouer-ioyed with the gaining of that which they had so long desired, and now so little hoped for, they forgat their wonted crueltie and breach of faith, is doubted. I

The conditions vpon which the Turkes entred into the citie.

The extraordinary curtesy of the Turkes toward the garison souldiers of Strigonium at their departure thence.

This citie thus yeelded the third of October, and the Turks forgetting their wonted cru- K eltie, according to their faith and promise before giuen, in safetie conducted these cowardly souldiors within a league of Comora, helping them by the way to carrie their sicke and wounded men, together with their fardles, which the Turks oft times carried vpon their own shoulders. These cowards which thus went out, with their Gouernor sent out also with them, were in number a thousand whole and sound men, fitted whilst they were in the citie, with all things necessarie for their honour, and defence of the place: but themselues destitute and void of all honour and courage. A thousand, which all together were not worth their Gouernor alone, seeing that in him alone there remained more valour than in all that whole multitude. Many of the Inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not forsake the place, but by the leaue of the Turks there remained still; the rest which would not, hauing leaue in safetie to depart L whither they would.

Thus this famous Citie of Strigonium, one of the strongest bulwarkes of Christendome against the Turks, which the Christians had now holden by the space of ten yeares and one month, after that it was by Count Charles Mansfelt woon from the Turks, when as it had long time before been in the Turks possession, woon from the Christians by Sultan Solyman, now againe (as is before said) fell into the power of the Turks, with threescore and ten pieces of great ordnance, and a wonderfull deale of other warlike prouision.

The captaines and chiefe authours of the mutinie, and yeelding vp of Strigonium, imprisoned, condemned, and most shamefully, but worthily executed.

These base and cowardly Souldiours, together with the Count their Gouernour, being come to Comora, were iustly despoyled both of their honour and of their armes, and sent backe againe to Presburg, where cursed and detested of all the world, and especially M of the Hungarians themselues (who although they were reuolted from their alleageance toward the Emperour, yet could they not but much detest their so shamefull and notable cowardise) were there the chiefe of them committed to prison; where after they had for a cer-

A a certaine time lien, and being brought to iudgement, and conuicted of treason, in deliuering vp the city of Strigonium vnto the Turks, and in so doing to haue greatly damnified the Christian commonweale, they were therefore condemned, and according to the qualitie of their offences, diuersly in this manner executed. Captain Leonard Fredericke Schleker had his iudgment, first to haue his right hand cut off, and his tongue drawne out behinde in his necke, and both of them nailed to the gallowes, and afterwards to be hanged; howbeit through the intercession of many of his friends he was not hanged but beheaded. Iohn Michael Schorer, Iohn Hopff, Adam Lindawar, Philip Dur, and Caspar Lielharter, all Captaines, were adiudged to haue their right hands first cut off and nailed to the gallowes, and afterward hanged, but through the intercession of Countie Mansfeld, they were hanged, and their hands not cut off. Iohn Lau-
B tenberger was condemned to be quartered aliue; but was at the intercession of Countie Mansfeld, first beheaded, and afterward quartered. Iohn Dischoff with eleuen other were only hanged. Laurence Marshal was enjoyned to serue two yeares against the Turks as a common souldior, without pay; but through the intercession of Countie Mansfeld had one yeare pardoned him. Ieremie Strelin, with diuers other, which were either fled, or els remained still in Strigonium, were judged, their names to be set vpon the gallowes, and being afterwards caught, some of them to be quartered, and other some their hands to be cut off, and nailed vpon the gallowes, and afterward hanged. And thus these disloyal Captaines, by shunning of an honourable death in defence of Strigonium, and performing of their dutie; by neglecting the same, procured vnto themselues a most shamefull death, attended vpon with perpetuall infamie and

But as the losse of this strong place was vnto the Christians heauie and grieuous, so was it vnto the Turkes no lesse pleasing and joyfull; it being the place they had of long aboue all others desired, and whereat they had euer since the losse thereof, with their great armies in Hungarie, for the space of ten yeares still aimed. Howbeit this their joy endured not long, their prosperitie being too hot to hold out without some cooling blast of aduerse fortune. For the same report of Fame, which with the right hand presented vnto the Great Sultan at Constantinople, the pleasing newes of the winning of Strigonium in Hungarie; euen with the left hand deliuered likewise vnto him the melancholie report of the ouerthrow of his great armies in Asia, with the losse of Damasco the greatest citie of Syria. For, to begin with the D greatest first: The King of Persia, inuaded by Cicala Bassa, Sultan Achmat his great Lieutenant in Asia; and hearing that the Bassa of Caramania had expresse charge, with all speed to come vnto him with a great supplie of souldiours to be taken vp in Caramania and the countries thereabout: he then hauing a puissant armie on foot, before prepared for all euents, presently set forward against Cicala: whome he comming vpon before hee was readie to fight, by his vnexpected comming, and sudden charge, ouerthrew his armie, and tooke from him all his great ordnance; Cicala himselfe with three hundred souldiours, with much adoe escaping and retyring himselfe to Adena; which Citie the Persian King, pursuing Cicala, shortly after straitly besieged. With which vnluckie newes Sultan Achmat much troubled, forthwith writ vnto the Bassa of Trebezond, with all speed to send aid vnto Cicala: who taking vn-
E to him some other of the Turks Commanders, with a great armie set forward on his journey. Of whose comming Cicala hearing, the better to direct the Bassa in his proceeding, caused himselfe with ten of his souldiours whom he best trusted, secretly by night to be let downe ouer the walls of the citie. And so comming to the Bassa, together with him kept on his way to ioyne battell with the King as neere vnto the citie as he could, for that he had taken order before he came out of the citie, that so soone as they should perceiue the battell to be joyned, they should forthwith sallie out vpon the backes of the Persians, and so by holding of them with a doubtfull battell, to further the victorie. All which the Persian King, hearing of the Bassa's comming, wisely doubting, and not willing to forsake the siege, diuided his armie, and leauing one part thereof to continue the siege, went himselfe with the other to meet the Bassa:
F Wherein hee vsed such expedition and speed, that with all his power falling vpon him before he could put his men in order, or range his battell, he made of the Turkes (now confusedly and without all order fighting more for the safegard of their liues, than for any hope they had of victorie) such an exceeding great slaughter, that few of them escaped, but were there almost all slaine. Cicala himselfe but with two or three moe, hauing much ado by getting ting from little hope, the so by passing ouer the riuer, to escape the danger. After which victorie so easily gained, the King returning againe to the siege, after many assaults and braue faults thereunto giuen, and many men on both sides lost, [illegible] his enterprise.

Now with this newes of the losse of his armies, and of the victories of the Persian king, the Turkish Emperour Achmat enraged, caused Cicala Bassa his house at Constantinople, full of treasure & wealth, to be rifled, after the manner of the world, deeming of the doings of him so great a Captaine, according to the euent and euill successe thereof, though not in his power to haue been: he died: neuertheless shortly after, he caused great summes of money to be deliuered out of his treasures, and new forces raised for the renewing of the war against the Persian King. Who which seruice (now become vnto the Turks dreadfull) when as many of the Ianizaries were to be appointed, they after their proud and insolent manner, all arising vp in mutinie, [illegible] ly, That they would not stirre one foot out of Constantinople, except they were both before hand payed, and assured also to haue their wages encreased: complaining grieuously [illegible] of the Bassa of Damasco, the Great Sultan his high Treasurer, that he conuerting the [illegible] treasures to his owne vse, did not pay the souldiers their wages due. For the appeasing of which mutinie and tumult, the Sultan caused the same Bassa to be apprehended and his head stricken off, and so with the price of his bloud againe appeased them.

The Ianizaries mutinie.

But letting the Persian King triumphing in his victories, and the Great Sultan grieuing at his losses, let vs turne aside into Siria, to see the troubles the Turkes had euen among themselues, to the weakening of their State, and the increasing [illegible] the Great Sultans cares & griefe. The two Bassa's of Damasco and Aleppo had (as is before declared) been at great discord and variance betwixt themselues, and the Bassa of Aleppo in deed ouerthrowne, and in his city besieged, glad to make peace with the other Bassa, by yeelding vnto all such things as it pleased him to demand. Which two Bassa's for all that being diuersly affected vnto the State, long agreed not, he of Damasco continuing faithfull in his allegeance towards the Great Sultan, and the other of Aleppo secretly inclining vnto rebellion. Which the Bassa of Damasco perceiuing and ioyning vnto him the Bassa's of Tripolis and Gazare, with their vnited Forces went against the Bassa of Aleppo, leading with them 60000 good men, with purpose to haue besieged the Bassa of Aleppo his enemie, in his citie. But he betimes aduertised of this his designe, and not vnprouided for his comming, quickely called together his Forces, and had in verie short time raised an armie of thirtie thousand valiant men, whom he encouraging, and finding them willing to follow him whithersoeuer he would lead them, marched directly towards his enemies; with whom he meeting, [illegible] ioyned battell with them, which was fought with such furie and hideous noise, as if it had been two thunder-claps opposing each other in one cloud, striuing of themselues, which should burst out first, being like people, like armes, and like order of fight. The medley for a great time continued sharpe and furious, the number of the one side counteruailing the valour of the other, and the others valor ballancing the others great number: howbeit in the end the lone Bassa ouercame the other three, and the smaller number the greater, and putting them to flight, remained sole victors of the field. Now the victorious Bassa, as wise to vse the victorie, as he was valiant to obtaine the same, so eagerly pursued them, that without giuing them leaue to breathe, hee besieged Tripolis, the Bassa whereof at his comming abandoned the same, and carrying with him all his treasure, fled into Cyprus; which made the taking of the place vnto the victorious Bassa easie, who rifled and ransacked the same: and not content with this conquest; forthwith besieged the great and strong citie of Damasco, resolued to die in the plaines thereof, or to become victorious within the walls of the same. During which siege, the Bassa of Tripolis had out of the prouinces and countries of the Turks thereabouts, raised another great [illegible] e, and was comming to raise the siege, and to rescue the Citie. Whereof the Bassa of Aleppo hearing, rose with the greatest part of his armie, and meeting with him, gaue him ba[illegible], and therein the second time ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Which misfortune [illegible] maied the mindes of the besieged, that despairing of all succour and reliefe, they by co[illegible] of their gouernor fell to parley with the enemies, and so vpon certaine capitulations ye[illegible] vnto him the place. Whereinto the Bassa entering, found therein great treasure, raised of t[illegible] Turkes tributes, whereupon hee seised, and by the [illegible]ues thereof resolued to make himselfe master of all Syria, the chiefe citie

A citie whereof he had now in his owne power: whereunto he gaue free accesse and traffique vnto all the Merchants of Persia and of the Indies.

Now in the time of this his prosperitie, newes was brought him, That the Beglerbeg of Natolia had sent his Lieutenant with a great armie against him; who knowing that diligence was the spirit of conquest, and that to conquer was to little purpose, without a vigilant care for the preseruation thereof, rested not vpon his former good fortune, but marched directly towards his enemies. Wherein his successe was answerable vnto his designe, for within the space of two dayes he had taken all the passages which might giue way vnto his enemies to distresse him: and in the streights of the mountaines, whereby the enemie was to passe, layed a great ambush of two thousand harquebusiers and three thousand horse, who the enemies
B being passed, and hee charging them a head, set vpon them in the rereward, and brought such a feare vpon them, that hauing made a great fight, in fine they hauing lost a number of men, were glad to flie, and to leaue the victorie to the Bassa. And to the encreasing of his good happes, he intercepted a Ship, cast by weather vpon that coast, laded with great treasure, bound from Alexandria to Constantinople with the tributes of Ægypt, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Persian King aduertised, sought to ioyne with him in amitie, highly commending his valiant acts, and sending vnto him honourable Presents; to wit, a Pistoll, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all set with pretious stones, esteemed to be worth fiftie thousand Crownes. This flame of rebellion spread abroad out of Syria, into Caramania, and so farther and farther into the lesser Asia. Which
C was the cause that the Great Sultan sent with all speed vnto the Visier Bassa, then in Hungarie; commaunding him, now that Strigonium was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of peace, hee should now vpon reasonable conditions conclude the same, to the end that his affaires on this side of his Empire being set in quiet and securitie, hee might foorthwith after turne his Forces against the Persians and the Rebels in Asia.

The Beglerbeg of Natolia his Lieutenant with his Armie discomfited by the Bassa of Aleppo.

But after all these great troubles, to returne againe into Hungarie. The Rebels there had D of long besieged the strong towne of Newhusel, as is before declared: which being hitherto valiantly defended by the German garrison therein, was now brought to such extremitie, as that it was thought almost impossible to be longer defended, the garrison souldiours thereinbeing with often assaults for the most part slaine, and the rest of them that were left, grieuously wounded. Of which strong Towne (being as it were the Key of that side of the Countrey) the Turkes which together with the Rebels besieged the same, were for the commodious scituation thereof verie desirous: and the Rebels thereunto as vnwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly euer be againe from them recouered. For which cause Illishascius one of the Captaines of the Hungarian Rebels then at the siege thereof, perceiuing it could not long be kept, to the intent that the Turks should not by force obtaine the same, by letters requested of Bassa the Emperours Lieutenant, though then his enemie, That the towne might be deliuered vnto Humanoius, another Captaine of the Hungarian Re-
E bels, lest the Turks should by force obtaine the same: assuring him vpon the peril of his owne life, and the confiscation of all his goods to the Emperour, that vpon a reconciliation and peace to be made betwixt the Emperour and the Hungarians his subiects, he should againe deliuer the same towne and Fortresse into his possession. Whereupon by commaundement of the Archduke and of Bassa, the Towne was yeelded vp the seuenteenth day of the moneth of October, vnto the aforesaid Humanoius, and the Hungarians onely receiued into the towne; yet with this condition, That the Germane souldiours which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the siege, might still stay in the towne in pay, and keepe watch and ward together with the rest of the Hungarians, Humanoius hauing commaund ouer them all.

Newhusel yeelded vnto the Hungarian Rebell.

Wherefore the Turkes seeing themselues disappointed of their purpose, for the obtaining F of this strong Towne, rising by night, and not a little discontented with the Hungarians, marched towards Strigonium, at the siege whereof the Visier Bassa lay. Howbeit within a few dayes after, the Hungarians not liking to haue the Germanes in garrison with them, turned them with their Captaine Strenius out of the Towne, and yet safely conducted them to Comara.

the same courtesie wherewith we receiued them, making stay of him, vntill that they might all three together be dismissed. And for because that his Embassage was vndertaken for the furtherance of the common good, although it wanted the wished successe, yet wee haue thought it good to giue thanks vnto your Maiestie therefore, and in most friendly manner to greet you by this your said Embassadour, whom we haue commended vnto you for that the time hee heere stayed in our Court, he so behaued himself, as hee well deserued both our and your Maiesties fauour, whereof wee will him to bee partaker. God blesse your Maiestie with all felicitie, and long to bee good treasure preserue the same.

These Embassadors with these letters thus dismissed, one of them went into Polonia, and there declared vnto the king the great loue and affection of the Persian king [illegible] offering vnto him all loue and kindnesse: first requesting him, That he would [illegible] iustice in all friendship and brotherly loue: and then, that hee would take vp [illegible] against the Turke their common enemy: promising on his Masters behalfe, That he should not lay downe armes vntill that enemie were vtterly brought to nought and destroied, so that the Christian Princes would on the other side likewise impugne him. This was a strange message, and not before heard of in Polonia, where, for all that, the messenger was courteously and bountifully entertained, and afterward with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requested, was so honourably dismissed.

The Turks and Hungarian Rebels ioyne in the Imperiall warres.

But leauing these Embassadours vnto their long journey: to returne againe into Hungarie. A great number of the Turkes and Hungarian Rebels meeting together at Hidweg, had a purpose secretly to haue surprised and oppressed the Imperiall souldiers in their campe. Of which their purpose they in good time aduertised, and thereupon keeping good watch and ward, so receiued the Turks and Rebels at their comming, contrarie to their expectation, as that after a small fight they caused them to betake themselues to flight: whome the Imperials so hotly pursued towards Canisia, that they slew of them about a thousand, tooke about two hundred more of them prisoners, with fifteene hundred horse which they carried away with them, and so hauing left sufficient garrisons on that side of the countrey towards Canisia, returned themselues towards Vienna. In the meane time the Commissioners from the Emperor being met together at Comora, about the treatie of peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the sixth of December receiuing letters from the Bassa of Buda, certaine of them the next day after went by water downe the riuer of Danubius to Buda: where they being honorably receiued, and hauing much and long talke with the Bassa concerning a peace, found little difficultie therein, but that the Turkes said they could not hereof determine nothing, without the presence and consent of the Hungarians. With which answer they full of hope returned backe againe to Comora, as did also Sigismund Forgat with the like hope of peace from Botscay. At which time Botscay beeing about to depart from the assemby of Kirpay, backe againe to Cassouia, gaue power and authoritie to Illiashascius for the furthering of the treatie for peace: who hauing receiued letters of safe conduct from the Archduke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his wife went to Vienna: who beeing admitted vnto the Archdukes presence, and hauing had an houre and halfes talke with him, and euerie day after conferred with the counsellors from eight a clocke to twelue, at length composed all difficulties and differences touching the treatie of peace, excepting fiue articles onely concerning religion, the free exercise whereof the Hungarians in any wise required; so that now men began to conceiue some good hope of a peace to be in time concluded.

The treatie of peace with the Turke and Rebels begun.

1606 This yeare thus ending with the beginning of the treatie for peace, the next yeare begun with the wonted troubles of warre, the rebellious Haiducks in Hungarie doing great harm in the vpper Hungarie, tyrannizing after their woonted manner vpon men of all sort and condition. Where giuing diuers assaults vnto diuers cities, they being valiantly repulsed, were constrayned to retire (the Polonians and Cossacks defending the same) yet did they neuertheless no little harme vnto the countrey inhabitants. Whereof complaint being made vnto the King of Polonia, he by his Embassadour sent to Botscay at Cassouia, obtained, that those spoiling Haiducks should be called backe againe out of these parts.

The Haiduckes do great harme in the vpper Hungarie.

Now had Illiashascius the negotiator for the treatie of peace to be made with the Rebels, so well

A well dealt in that matter, as that the same, in the latter end of Ianuarie should haue beene published at Vienna, but that certaine of the chiefe of the Clergie could not bee brought to consent, that the free exercise of Religion should indifferently be granted to all the people in generall, but to the Nobilitie onely. Whereupon Illiashascius with the rest of the Commissioners for the Hungarians, with great discontentment beeing about to returne home againe without any thing at all concluded, the deputies for the Emperour seeing that it could not bee otherwise brought to passe, at length agreed (although neuer so much contrarie to the liking of the Clergie men) to satisfie the Hungarians in this their request, and that the free exercise as well of the reformed, as of the Romish Religion, should be permitted to all men throughout all Hungarie, in such sort, as it had before beene in the time of the Emperours

B Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the libertie of the Religion, letters were deliuered vnto Illiashascius; all the other points concerning the peace beeing put off vnto the next assemblie of the States of Hungarie, shortly after to bee holden at Pressbourg.

The free exercise of Religion granted to the Hungarians.

About the beginning of March the Spahi at Constantinople had requested of the Visier Bassa, That it might be lawfull for themselues to take vp their woonted pension of the farmers and husbandmen here and there in the countrey: which although it were vnto them by the Visier Bassa denied, who had commaundement from the great Sultan within a few dayes after, to giue euerie one of them his present pay in money; yet they not so contented, but going out of the Citie, presumptuously presumed to trouble the countrey men, and to doe

C the farmers great harme. For which their insolencie, the great Sultan (the chiefe Captaines and leaders of them beeing againe returned into the Citie) caused them some to be beheaded, some to be hanged, and othersome to be bound in chaines and drowned: whereby no small feare was strucke into the rest of the common souldiers. But the rebellion in Asia still encreasing, and the Rebels there secretly both fauoring and furthering the proceedings of the Persian king, the Sultan forthwith sent for the Visier Bassa, who the last yere had serued in Hungarie, to go into Asia, to represse the Rebels there, and also to withstand the proceedings of the Persian king: committing in the meane time the mannaging of the war in Hungarie vnto his Lieutenant.

The treatie of peace both with the Turks and the Rebels, was yet in hand, whereunto how much the Turks were for their part inclined, the garrison souldiers of Rab had good proofe: for the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their request appointed for the treatie, and whereon the Commissioners on both parts there meeting together, should haue furthered the negotiation of the peace, not past fiftie of the Turkes comming to the gate of the towne, required to bee let in, as if they had come for that purpose. Whome our men nothing suspecting, were about to receiue them into the towne; when as a sentinell without the towne, it being a thicke mist, perceiued three thousand more of the Turkes lurking there by, and forthwith giuing an alarme to those of the towne, bewrayed the enemies treacherie, who thereupon retired, they of the towne discharging their great ordnance after them. The next moneth, about the beginning of Aprill, certaine messengers came from Eperia (a citie of the vpper Hungarie, yet holden for the Emperour) to Vienna, declaring the most miserable state of

E that Citie: which although the way thereunto beeing three or foure weeks before opened, it had receiued some good store of victuall, yet now (as they said) was so on euerie side by the Rebels beset, as that no prouision at all could more thereunto come: hoping by that meanes to bring to passe, that the citisens pinched with hunger and want of things necessarie, should at length yeeld themselues together with the citie into their power. By which meanes they but a little before had obtained the strong towne of Tokay: wherein the famine was so great, that the souldiers had not onely eaten their shooes and leather jerkins, but had now also kild two boyes to eat, and some others of them had cast lots among themselues, which should be kild for the other to eat. By which extreamitie Ruber the Gouernor of the place, was enforF ced to yeeld: vnto whom Botscay, who then lay at Cassouia, is said to haue offered a great sum of money, with many other good things, to haue taken his part; all which he most constantly refused, protesting euen vnto death to continue faithfull in his obedience to the Emperour.

Eperia by the Rebels distressed.

A being vnto them ſtrangers: reſolued now in a generall aſſemblie of the Eſtates by them about this time holden, to take vpon themſelues the defence of their country, againſt ſuch ſudden incurſions and tumults of the mutinous ſouldiers, and no more to relie vpon forreine protection, ſtill to ſeeke when they had moſt need thereof. Wherefore to aſſure themſelues in their own ſtrength, they with a generall conſent agreed to haue alwaies in readineſſe two thouſand horſmen and eight thouſand footmen, to be maintained of the common charge; fiftie of the countrey peaſants ſtill finding of one of the ſaid ſouldiers. The inhabitants of Auſtria prouide to ſtand vpon their owne ſtrength for the defence of their owne country.

And much about this time, viz. the third of Iune, Illiſhaſcius a great man amongſt the Rebels, and yet the greateſt furtherer of the peace, (as appeared by his doings and by that wee haue before of him written) hauing before obtained letters of ſafe conduct from the Archduke, came now againe with his wife alſo to Vienna, there more at large to conferre vpon the Articles for a peace to be concluded, with ſuch as were on the Emperours behalfe for that purpoſe deputed. Where comming to conferre and talke vpon the matter, hee was ſo croſſed by Nicholas Biſhop of Vienna, who hitherto had beene preſent in Counſell together with the reſt of the Commiſſioners (a great enemie vnto the peace, in reſpect of the article concerning the libertie of Religion) hee was I ſay by him ſo croſſed, as that there was no hope of any thing to bee for the common quiet concluded, ſo long as hee was there preſent. For which cauſe he, on both ſides and of all men deſirous of the peace diſliked, was in the Archdukes name willed no more to come into the Counſell for the diſturbing of the peace. In which negotiation for the concluding of the peace, Illiſhaſcius had taken ſuch paines in trauelling too and fro betwixt the Archduke then lying at Vienna, and Botſcay with the States of Hungarie then lying at Caſſouia, and ſo debated the matter on both ſides, that all things beeing as good as agreed vpon; for a full concluſion of all matters, he himſelfe, together with George Humanoius, Francis Magot, Sebaſtian Tockell, Staniſlaus Turſon, and others, with two hundred horſe, and two and thirtie waggons, in all foure hundred perſons, the ſeuenth of September came to Vienna with fiftie Huſſars following of them: Shortly after whoſe comming, the treatie for peace was earneſtly begun with often meſſengers paſſing too and fro betwixt Vienna and Caſſouia to Botſcay lying then verie daungerouſly ſicke, vntill that all the articles of peace were neere about the fourteenth of September fully on both parts agreed vpon: moſt difference ariſing about the article for the free exerciſe of Religion. For although it was before declared, that men might haue the free exerciſe of religion: yet the Hungarians recalling that generall word of Religion vnto a particularitie, would needes haue it ſet downe, that men might haue the free exerciſe of thoſe Religions which are at this day called the Lutheran, Caluinian, and Romiſh religion: neither would they conclude any peace vntill they were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied. Which peace ſo concluded, the next day after, the deputies for the Hungarians ſent an embaſſador to the Viſier Baſſa at Buda, to certifie him of all their proceedings, and to requeſt him not as yet to attempt any thing for the diſturbing of the peace: now the articles whereupon the peace was concluded, were theſe: The Biſhop of Vienna a great enemie to the peace to haue been concluded betwixt the emperor & his diſcontented ſubiects. A peace concluded betwixt the emperor & his diſcontented ſubiects of the vpper Hungaries.

First, That from thenceforth it ſhould be lawfull for euerie man throughout the Kingdome of Hungarie, to haue the free vſe of his Religion, and to beleeue what he would.

2 That if the Hungarians ſo thought good, they might chuſe a Palatine for their Gouernour, and that in the meane time the Archduke Matthias ſhould no more vſe the title of a Gouernour, but of a Vicaroy.

3 That the crowne of Hungarie ſhould ſtill be left in the Emperours keeping.

4 That the Biſhops that were nobly diſcended in Hungarie, and had lands of their owne, ſhould from thenceforth be admitted into the Counſell, but the other Biſhops not ſo to be receiued.

5 That Botſcay for himſelfe and his heires male ſhould for euer hold Tranſyluania.

6 That the ſame Countrey of Tranſyluania ſhould bee ſtill ſubiect vnto the Kingdome of Hungarie.

7 That for his Armes he ſhould beare three Royall Crownes and three open Helmets.

8 That he ſhould no more afterwards ſtile himſelfe Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdome of Hungarie.

9 That

About the ſame time Mathias, who had [illegible] for a little [illegible] from the ſame. ring of the peace in Hungarie, [illegible] letters from [illegible] vnto [illegible] great man at Vienna, whereby hee declared, that Botſcay without the conſent of the Eſtates of Hungarie could of himſelfe determine nothing concerning the concluſion of the peace: who had oft times told him to his face, that rather than they would againe ſubmit themſelues to a forreine Gouernour, they would for euer put themſelues vnder the Turkes protection: and yet promiſed by the ſame letters, that although hee had got vnto himſelfe great diſpleaſure thereby with the Haiduckes, hee would not for all that ceaſe by all meanes to draw the States at their next aſſembly vnto his part, ſo that that which was before concluded at Vienna concerning Religion, ſhould not againe be reuerſed: for many of them (as hee ſaid) were afraid that it would not be performed, which was there promiſed vnto the States concerning the exerciſe of their Religion. And that therefore they could not yet bee perſuaded to withdraw themſelues from vnder the Turkes protection, vntill they ſaw themſelues ſufficiently aſſured, both for the libertie of their Religion, and the keeping of their antient priuiledges. And that they could not, nor would not endure a forreine Gouernour to rule ouer them, with whome they could not talke; nor yet ſuffer the Clergie men to haue any voyces in their ciuill affaires. And therefore (hee ſaid) hee thought it verie neceſſarie that the Emperor ſhould not doubt in this point to gratifie the Hungarians. And that Tranſyluania, whereupon hee had beene hitherto enforced to beſtow ſo great coſt for the keeping thereof, beeing now left vnto Botſcay, hee ſhould appoint ſuch a Gouernour ouer Hungarie as the States of that countrey ſhould require. For that there was no hope of any peace to be made with the Turkes, except Botſcay and the States of Hungarie ſhould vndertake the treatie thereof; ſeeing that they but onely ſeeking for a peace in ſhew, were oftentimes diſcouered but to ſeeke for their owne aduantages and profits.

Illiſhaſcius vngratefull vſed by the Hungarians.

But concerning Illiſhaſcius himſelfe, the Hungarian Rebels ſeeing him ſo much to labour about the concluding of a peace, in ſcorne called him by the by-name of Cripeliſhacius, as hee that too much enclined vnto the Germans: which by-name he tooke in ſo ill part, as that hee departed ſtraight to Eperia, with a purpoſe not to haue beene preſent at the next aſſemblie of the States: but beeing againe pacified, and by Botſcay called backe, hee made ſuch a notable ſpeech vnto the States in their next aſſemblie, that all men now began both to hope and wiſh more for peace than they had before done.

In the meane time the Turkes in great number beeing gathered together to Belgrade, expected the end of this treatie for peace: and letters from the great Sultan to Botſcay were intercepted alſo: whereby hee aduiſeth him to proceed in his purpoſe, and joyning with his powers, to ſeize vpon Auſtria, Bohemia, and Morauia; for that hee could be contented with Hungarie and Tranſyluania, and leaue the reſt of the Prouinces vnto Botſcay as his inheritance.

The Tartars about this time were about to make a road into Polonia; but when as they with their oft incurſions had not a little troubled the Haiduckes alſo in the vpper Hungarie, they reſolued amongſt themſelues to ioyne their forces together, and to fight as well againſt the Turkes as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to truſt the one nor the other.

Hereupon, when as the Turkes in great number came to aſſault Lippa, a towne of the Haiduckes, they forſaking the towne, fortified the caſtle with certaine companies of armed men, and afterwards beſtowed many others heere and there in caues and cellars in the towne, and layed great ſtore of gunpouder in the ſtreets. Vnto which towne the Turkes comming, and finding the gates open, and none to reſiſt them, haſted to haue taken the Caſtle. But in the meane time, the powder which the Haiduckes had layed taking fire, blew vp a number of them, and they which lay hid in the caues and cellars forthwith breaking out, ſlew of them whomſoeuer they met, and ſo made of the Turkes a great ſlaughter, and againe cleered the towne.

The Eſtates of Auſtria conſidering the great harmes they had in theſe late troubles receiued, as well from the Hungarian Rebels, as from the Emperors mutinous ſouldiers; and by experience taught how dangerous a thing it was for them to reſt vpon other mens protection, being

A taine faire pieces of plate, an hundred thousand duckets, with diuers other things of great valuc.

But whilest they there stayed, expecting to heare from the Vifier Bassa then at Buda, a sudden insolent accident fell out, like enough to haue broken off againe the peace, alreadie made with the Hungarians, as also to haue vtterly cut off the treatie of peace to be had with the Turks, and to haue set them all together by the eares againe. For albeit that the first article of the peace made with the Hungarians, was, That euery man should haue the free exercise of his Religion; yet the eighth day of October, about three of the clocke in the afternoon, when as a certaine Hungarian Lutheran Preacher was in the pulpit preaching to the people in a Church, in the suburbs of Comora, Buchem and Kneuie, two Captaines, comming from dinner with certaine of their seruants more than halfe drunke, with their swords drawn rusht into the Church, and draue out thence the Preacher, vpon whom Captaine Buchem his Trumpetter also discharged a pistoll, and raised such a tumult in the Church, that diuers children were troden to death vnder foot, and the rest put in great feare of their liues.

The Peace alreadie concluded with the Hungarians, like enough to haue again bin broken off throw the insolencie of some few disordered persons.

Which insolent fact so mooued the Hungarians, that Turson and Buaian, there present with the rest of the Commissioners, readie to haue gone about the treatie of the peace, would needs the next day haue departed from Comora, and were hardly by Mollart and Collonitz entreated to stay; Buchem and Kneuie the two Captaines being bound to their appearance for the answering of the mater, and the trumpetter with yrons on his heeles clapt in prison. But the newes hereof being carried to Neuhusel, and (as the manner of report is) by fame made far

C greater than it was, as, That an hundred and fiftie persons was slaine in the Church, there arose such a tumult among the Hungarians there, as that Illishaschius with the rest of the Captaines had much ado to quiet and appease the same: who joyning with the Turks of Strigonium, and the Haiducks of the Island, had determined now by night to haue inuaded Comora, where the outrage was committed, had not Pogranie the elder (a man of great grauitie) comming from thence, declared vnto Illishaschius and the rest of the Captaines, all the matter as it was done; vpon whose relation the whole tumult was againe appeased. But for as much as the two aforesaid Captaines, bound to their appearance, were by night fled from Comora to Vienna, the Hungarians were verie earnest to haue them seuerely punished, as breakers of the first article of the Peace, concerning Religion. Botscay in the meane time beheaded Catayus

Botscay causeth his Chancellour to be beheaded.

D his Chancellor, who had gone about to haue poysoned him, in hope after his death to haue been Prince of Transyluania himselfe; placing Iohn Ianosy in his stead, and giuing him Catay his lands.

Peace now made with the Hungarians (as is afore said) and Commissioners appointed for a treatie of peace to be had with the Turks also, (whereunto the Vifier Bassa, then lying at Buda, was as forward as any, being so commanded from the Great Sultan his Master) there wanted but a place commodious for the said Commissioners, without suspition of danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Whereupon Cæsar Gallen a man of great experience in such matters, with some other Captaines, were appointed to finde out some such conuenient place for them to meet in: who hauing viewed many, at length made choice of one with-

E in halfe a league of Comora, so fit for that purpose, as if nature had prouided it for the same. The great riuer of Danubius being there diuided into three parts, made therein three Islands, all compassed round with the arms thereof, into which Islands the Commissioners for the Emperour, for the Turke, and for the Hungarians, might come without let one of another, to entreat of their affaires, and so in little boats prepared for that purpose, passe ouer one to another as their occasions required. Into this place, so commodious for all three parties, the Deputies for the Emperour the fiue and twentieth day of October, conducted by the horsemen of Mansfeld, Hohenlo, and Bonchimin. After whom followed Illishaschius, and the other Deputies for the Hungarians, assisted with the nobilitie of Hungarie, all attending the comming of the Great Sultans Commissioners; who likewise immediatly after came, being brought vp the riuer in

The twentieth of September following, the Embassador for the Hungarians and of Bat[illegible] being admitted vnto the presence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him [illegible] for the forenamed rebellion, and all that was there [illegible]ne: vnto whome fecurtie for the same was afterward giuen by the Prouinces; then [illegible], also to assure them, that they should not be therefore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before done, the title of the Prince of Transyluania was left vnto Botscay for terme of his life: who feeling his neancie sayly to encrease, would oftentimes say, That hee could willingly die, so that it might please God before his death, to giue him leaue to excuse himselfe of his rebellion before the whole Romane Empire. And so about the end of September all the aforesaid Embassadours for the Hungarians and Botscay, beeing assembled into the Castle of Vienna, together with the Emperours Councell, and certaine other Noblemen of the Prouinces belonging vnto the Emperour, receiued euerie one of them the Articles of the peace copied out, and faire written in parchment: which done, they returned euerie one to his owne dwelling. But Illishaschius went from thence to Neuhusel, to be present at the peace to bee afterwards made with the Turke also: from whence hee afterwards writ Letters vnto the Vifier Bassa, to request him, not yet to attempt any thing against the Emperours Prouinces, but peaceably and quietly to expect his Commissioners, which were shortly to come vnto him.

But in the meane time whilest this peace was thus in concluding, certaine Tartars at Constantinople, in their insolencie set fire vpon a certaine Iewes house, whereof arose such a terrible fire, as burnt not only many houses, but a great number of the Iewes themselues also: the harme there done beeing esteemed at fortie hundred thousand duckats. In which tumult and noise of the people running too and fro, and quenching of the fire, the great Sultan hauing a fall from his horse, was thereof for a while sicke.

The Turks of Canisia also hauing conspired with the Captaine of the lesser Comora, came to haue surprised the same. But the garrison souldiers there, hauing before had a suspition thereof, suffered so many of the Turkes as they knew they were able to ouercome, to enter; and so shutting the gates of the Citie, kild them euerie mothers sonne, the rest which were without, returning againe to Canisia.

Peace thus (as is aforesaid) concluded with the Hungarians, George Turſon, Nicholas Iſtuan, Iohn Mollart, and Althem, with some others, the Emperours Commissioners for a peace to be made with the Turkes, went to Comora; Sigiſmund Collonitz and Budin following, them with the armie, for as yet the said Commissioners durst not altogether trust the Turkes for intercepting of them by the way. Which Commissioners carried with them Solyman the Bassa of Buda, who had now beene seuen yeares kept prisoner in the Castle of Vienna, and Aly Bassa, both brauely apparelled in blew silke; six waggons following of them, wherein were carried certaine presents for the great Sultan, to wit, a most curious clocke, certaine

That euery one hath on the one part and on the other ... leagues, and enterprises of war, and from all ... of hostilities one against another, ... nathelesse to haue power to pursue ... and robbers, and ... keeping of the peace and ... knowledge, to the Turkes by common force to suppresse them, and to cause them ... and harmes by them done.

That all places, Castles, Townes, and Forts, should remaine without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by force, surprise, or treason, and so likewise the goods, families, and cattell of the country-men, which were of their territories and jurisdiction, Bocskay still holding all that was lately to him granted by the treatie of Vienna.

That all prisoners taken in the wars should be set at libertie, but especially such as had been taken in Townes and Citadels, which by their valour and courage they sought to haue defended; and the other prisoners to be deliuered by exchange and ransome, as should be most expedient and easie for both parties.

That all controuersies happening as well on this side as beyond the riuer of Danubius, should be peaceably ended by the iudgement of the Gouernor of Rab, of the Bassa of Buda, of the Gouernour of Sclauonia, and of the Gouernors of other places; and that if they should chance to be of such important weight and consequence, as that they could not by these Magistrats be determined and composed, that they should in that case be reserued to be decided by their Imperial Majesties: and that it should be lawfull both for the one partie and the other to repaire and build the places ruined, but not to build places of new, which might preiudice either the one part or the other.

That Amurath the Visier Bassa should send his messengers with Presents to the Archduke Matthias, and that the Emperor should dispatch an Embassador toward the Great Sultan with 200000 Duckets, and that the Great Sultan likewise should send his Embassador to Prague with great and rich Presents to the Emperor.

That this peace should begin in the yeare 1607, and continue for the space of twentie yeares, and that one of the Emperors should send vnto the other euery three yeares their Embassadors with their honorable and rich Presents, according to the pleasure and power of their Majesties.

That all the Emperors successors, as also those of the Kingdome of Hungarie, should be comprehended within this agreement of peace, together with all their kinsemen, allyes, and confederats, as likewise those of the Great Sultans also.

That the Christians should againe haue the Citie of Vacia, which they should at their pleasure keepe and fortifie, and ... Strigonium, with all the Villages thereto belonging, should remaine vnto vnto the Great Sultan; yet so, as that no man should be with any new tribute oppressed; and that such as had before been free from paying of tribute, should still keepe the same priuiledges.

And that the Turkes should not exact their tributes by the point of their swords, but by the way of Iustice, which they should commit vnto the discretion of Iudges and Receiuers, to that end appointed, that so it might be payed without oppressing of the people, except haply they which should pay it, vpon presumption should denie it, or too long deferre the payment of it: in which case it should be lawfull both for the one side and the other, to vse such meanes as should seeme vnto them good for the obtaining thereof.

These are the Articles of this Peace, which God turne to the glorie of his Name, and the benefit of the Christian Commonweale; and for which all the Townes of Hungarie made great joy and triumph, which they declared by the thundering of their Cannons, which they in great number discharged, with many other solemnities and triumphs. The Commissioners themselues in token of their conceiued joy, magnificently feasted one another also: which the Turks first began; and not content to haue made them great cheere, gaue vnto our Commissioners great Presents also: for the Bassa of Buda gaue vnto Mollart, Althem, Turson, Istuan, Collonitz, Budian, Hendoc, Cæsar Gallen, and Eleschin, braue and couragious horses most gallantly furnished; and to the rest exceeding rich garments and tapestrie hangings of great value. And as at the time of this feast, the troupe of Mansfeld had by many sallies and vollies of shot giuen great pleasure vnto the Turks as they sate at the table; Alla Bassa to declare the contentment and pleasure he had therein receiued, sent to the captaine of this troupe two hundred duckets, which he would not accept, requesting in stead of them to haue deliuered vnto him a certaine captaine by the Turks then kept prisoner; whom the Bassa caused freely to be deliuered vnto him, and withall sent backe againe the two hundred duckets to be diuided among the souldiours; which for all that Mansfeld refused, sending them backe againe vnto the Bassa. After which actions of joy and peace, euery man returned home well content and pleased.

Great joy and triumph in Hungarie for the peace concluded with the Turke.

These things thus done, and the peace confirmed, the Bassa of Buda forthwith sent his Embassadors to Constantinople, certifying the Great Sultan of the peace now made with the Christians; who thereof conceiuing great joy, with a number of Ianizaries and others, in great magnificence went to the Church, to giue thanks therefore vnto his Prophet Mahomet, and spent the next day with great sport and pleasure, purposing from thenceforth to turne all his force and power for the suppressing of his Rebels in Asia, and the subduing of the Persian King.

Now albeit that there was a peace of late concluded with the Hungarians at Vienna (as is before declared) yet diuers stirres and Tumults were neuertheless by the Haiducks in diuers places of the vpper Hungarie still raised: insomuch that about the end of Nouember the Inhabitants of the Countie of Bocotsie were through their insolencies enforced to joyne battel with them, wherein a number were on both sides slaine, and three countrey villages burnt: so that it should seeme, no peace can be so well and indifferently made, but that some will be still troubling and impugning the same.

the making of a good and assured peace for the appeasing of these wars: which euery one of them and all together, to that end employing the vttermost of their endeauours, at last the nineteenth of Nouember it was betwixt all the three parties fully agreed vpon and concluded, and hostages on all parts giuen one to another, with oathes and promises solemnly on all sides giuen and receiued, for the inuiolate keeping and obseruing of the same; the articles whereupon the said peace was concluded being these:

A peace concluded betweene the Emperour and the great Sultan.

Articles of the Peace concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan.

First, That the Emperor and the Great Sultan, in all their Letters, Dispatches, Instruments, and Embassages, should not stile themselues by any other names or additions, but by the names of Welbeloued Father and Sonne; to wit, the Emperour calling the Great Sultan his Sonne; and the Great Sultan the Emperour (in respect of his yeares) his Father.

That in the beginning of their Letters they should take vpon them the name and quality of Emperor, and not of King, respectiuely one of them another.

That these two Emperors should take order, that the realme of Hungarie and the Archdukedome of Austria, might be in rest, peace, and tranquilitie, and altogether deliuered and assured from all incursions, oppressions, and outrages of the men of war on both parties.

That it should be lawfull for the King of Spaine, if he so thought good, to enter into this treatie of peace, without the opposition or let of one or of the other of both these Emperors in any sort.

That the Tartars, and all other people vsually wont to come in armes into Hungarie, should be comprised within this treatie of the peace, so to be disarmed of all power by their meanes to do harme within the realme of Hungarie, and they there assured from their violences and robberies.

That euery one both on the one part and on the other, should be sure from making incursions and pillages, and enterprises of war, and from all acts of hostility one against another; and yet euery one neuertheless to haue power to pursue theeues and robbers, and such others seeking after bootie, to the disturbing of the peace, and iniurying of the Commonweale: whereof euery man should haue power to giue knowledge, to the intent by common force to suppresse them, and to cause them to recompence the wrongs and harmes by them done.

That all places, Castles, Townes, and Forts, should remaine without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by force, surprise, or treason, and so likewise the goods, families, and cattel of the countrey-men, which were of their territories and jurisdiction, Botscay still holding all that was lately to him granted by the treatie of Vienna.

goods, whether they were moueable or immoueable, during the time of this late war. He G wished them also in the next general assemblie of the States, with all their power and endeauor, to vrge the repealing of the Article concerning the burning of Heretiques, with all other Articles contrarie to their Religion: and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine as had in former time been vsed: neither in this next general assemblie of the Estates to neglect any thing which might seeme to concern their priuiledges and libertie. And that therefore they should be carefull to send thither wise and powerfull men, such as should not easily be ouercome with the clamors and outcries of the contrarie part. At length he wished them to consider of this also, how a true and sincere confederation might be made betwixt Hungary and Transiluania, so that a safe and quiet traffique and commerce might in both places be vsed. H

These things thus done, Botscay his sickneſſe still more and more encreasing vpon him, so at length preuailed, that it made an end of him, to the great sorrow and griefe of all the people in general, who had him in great honour and regard. He died at Cassouia the 30 of December, in the yeare 1606. He was honorably discended, and a man of great spirit, ambitious, wise, and politique, a great louer of his countrey, but an extreme enemie vnto the Germans, and their gouernment in Hungarie.

A little before his death, he earnestly perſuaded Iohn Iannſie his Chancellor to continue in his allegeance to the Emperor, and not to raise new stirres, or so much as in him was, not to suffer any to be raised. Neuertheleſſe, such his wholesome counsell not regarded, there were some who immediatly after his death were about to haue raised new forces, for to haue seised vpon Transyluania, and so to haue stirred vp new trouble. For preuenting whereof, Matthias I the Archduke forthwith sent a messenger vnto the States of the vpper Hungary; aduising them, That the great harmes and miseries considered which that part of Hungarie had of late felt end endured, almost to the vtter ruine and destruction thereof (which proceeded not so much from the wars with the Turks, as from their owne ciuile tumults and seditions) they should from thenceforth giue themselues to quietneſſe and peace, and not againe insolently to prescribe vnto the Emperor what to do, or how he was to dispose of the countrey of Transyluania; assuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter winke at such their rebellious plots and deuices, but forthwith turne all his power and forces to the vtter destruction and rooting out of such rebellious and seditious persons, the disturbers of the common peace and K quiet. By which the Archdukes words, some, otherwise readie enough to haue raised new stirres and troubles, were not therein so forward as otherwise haply they would haue bin, but kept themselues quiet.

The Emperour not to be blamed for making peace with the Turke.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much maruelled, that the Christian Emperour would thus make peace with the Great Sultan (as is aforesaid) he being then so much troubled with wars, both against his owne Rebels, and the Persian King, in Asia, most part of his forces being turned that way; so that a fitter time, or of more aduantage, could not haue beene wished for the Emperor to haue done great matters against him in, and not onely to haue holden his owne (which he did not) in Hungarie, but to haue recouered some good part of his losses there before receiued also. And indeed true it is, that the time then well serued for both: L but what auaileth opportunitie without power? And had the Hungarians (the greatest strength the Emperour hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that so great a kingdome) been at quiet and at his command, and he himselfe a Prince which had rested vpon his owne strength and power, euer at his pleasure to haue been raised, and as need should require supplied, without depending vpon his friends and allyes, then haply it might haue bin in him accounted a great ouersight, to haue omitted and ouerslipped so faire an opportunitie. But the Hungarians being then not only reuolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himselfe with his owne power not able to hold the field against them, or well to maintaine a defensiue warre; and his friends and allyes, his wonted and greatest stayes, then at his greatest need failing of him also, what should he in such M a case do but as he did? to accept of a reasonable peace whilest he might haue it; especially against such an enemie, as whose whole power being turned against him, might haue easily endangered his whole estate. For it is not reasonably to be thought, how the Emperour should of

A of himselfe, without the great aid of the other Christian Princes, his friends and allies, be able to withstand the huge and dreadfull power of the Othoman Emperour: (without ominous presage be it spoken) it is to be feared it will too true appeare, whensoeuer his wars and troubles in the East being ended, he shall againe turne his forces this way toward the West.

Now Botscay was no sooner dead, but that some others of the Nobilitie both of Hungarie 1607 and Transyluania (happily no lesse ambitious than was he) began by diuers means to seeke after and to aspire to that principalitie. Of whom, though some either with the weakneſſe of their owne meanes or with the threats of Matthias the Archduke deterred, ceased further to seeke after it: yet were there some others, who better supported, and nothing afraid of the Archdukes great words, laboured vnder hand to haue obtained it. For the crossing of whome, B and the auoiding of further troubles to be raised by these ambitious competitours, certaine of the Nobilitie of Transyluania gathered together at Claudionople the twelfth of Februarie, made choice of Sigismund Ragotsie for their Gouernor and their Prince of Transyluania, and Sigismund Ragotsie chosen prince of Transyluania, afterward yeeldeth vp the same Principalitie againe.
the more to assure him of their loue and affection towards him, bound themselues vnto him by the oath of their allegiance solemnely taken in the chiefe Church there. And afterward sent messengers to the Archduke Matthias at Vienna, to certifie him what they had done, and to excuse themselues thereof: who comming to Presburg the twelfth of March, there openly protested this election of Ragotsie for their Prince to haue been made, not for that they were about to rebell, or to reuolt from the Emperour, whome they would alwayes acknowledge for their Soueraigne Lord; but for that their neceſſitie so required, many of the Nobilitie
C both of Transyluania and of Hungarie gaping after this Principalitie, and going about, for the obtaining thereof, to raise new stirres and troubles. Howbeit, the same Ragotsie afterward doubting not to be able, without great trouble and danger, besides the Emperors displeasure, to hold the same Principalitie, of his own accord about a yeare after gaue the same vp again, and got himselfe out of the way to Sarentum: who was no sooner gone, but that Gabriel Bathor was about to haue stept into his place: vnto whome the States of Transyluania sent word by two of the Noblemen, That the free election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he should not seeke by force to entrude himselfe into the Principalitie, but quietly to come vnto the election, and not to bring with him aboue a thousand horsemen, and fiue hundred foot.

D About this time the strong towne of Neuhuse (otherwise called Neuheusel) the last yeare Neuhuse again deliuered vnto the Emperour.
so hardly woon by the Hungarian Rebels, was againe deliuered to Sigefrid Collonitz for the Emperour; who shortly after comming to Vienna, brought newes of a great number of the Turkes to haue risen vp in rebellion at Belgrade, to haue rifled the towne, and to haue burnt another towne, called Alischria, downe to the ground, and so with a great prey to be gone ouer to the Rebels: and also Redeius, Botscay his Lieutenant, in going to take possession of certaine lands giuen him by Botscay, to haue been by his owne tenants, lying in wait for him vpon a strait passage, slaine.

Amongst the articles of the peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutuall sending of Presents one of them vnto another: With which E Presents, when as the Embassadour, by the Emperour appointed for the carriage of the same to Constantinople, from day to day deferred to set forward, the Turkes and Tartars began to doubt, or else seemed to doubt, of the good meaning of the Christians, for the obseruing of the aforesaid peace; and thereupon began againe not onely to roame abroad into the territories of the Christians, but also caused the pledges left at Buda for the obseruing of the peace, to be hardly handled and clapt fast in prison: whom when as the Bassa of Buda shortly after suffered again a little to walke abroad, the proud Ianizaries were therewith so much offended that rising in a tumult, they had almost slaine the Bassa with stones, heaping vpon him many The Ianizaries in mutinie against the Bassa of Buda.
reproachfull words, and vnto his face calling him traitor and betrayer of his Prince and countrey, one of which pledges they grieuously wounded also. Which their insolencie the F Bassa in some sort to chastice, and to deterre them from doeing the like againe, caused certaine of them the night following to be secretly taken, and being bound, to be so cast into the riuer of Danubius. And yet shortly after, they purposing to make a road vpon the Christians, to colour such harmes as they should therein doe, and to lay all the blame bours. And now the Turkes in the meane time, in hope that the peace betwixt them and the Christians would not long hold, were come to Buda in such multitude, that the houses in the towne beeing not able to hold them, they were glad to set vp tents for them to lye in within the citie: for that the Bassa would not suffer them to set vp any tents abroad in the fields, lest the Christians should suspect them to be about the raising of an armie, and so to disturbe the peace. The States of Hungarie depart from Presburg without any thing doing.

But the States of Hungarie hauing staied full 15 daies, as the Archbishop had requested, and the Archduke not comming; made a solemne protestation before the Chapter of the Cathedrall Church at Presburg, that they departed from Presburg, and so returned home, not vpon any discontentment or contumacie, but for want of things necessary, and other their vrgent occasions (hauing aboue 7 weekes expected the Archdukes comming, without whom nothing could be done) and yet that if it should please the Emperor by solemne summons at any time after to call another Parliament, they would be readie vpon such summons giuen, to returne againe to Presburg, and there to consult of all such things, as should be for the good and welfare of the Common-weale: so that nothing were propounded contrary to the articles they the yere before agreed vpon at Vienna, which they would haue in all points kept whole & inuiolat: so that if any man should go about or attempt any thing in disposing and ordring of the publique affaires contrarie to that agreement, they would not in any wise ratifie the same, although it were by the Emperor himselfe allowed: which their protestation they requested to haue registred, and sealed with the Chapters Seale, and so not hauing done any thing at all for which they came, againe returned. The Haiduckes got about to raise new stirs in Hungarie.

After whose departure from Presburg, the Haiduckes (which had been vsed to liue by their swords, and not by their labour) of all others most discontented with this generall peace, began now to raise new stirres and tumults, and dayly to grow stronger and stronger, crauing aid of the Turkes and Tartars, and not of the other Hungarians their countreymen, now againe returned to their woonted allegeance vnto the Christian Emperour: a number of which Haiducks flocking to Buda, the Bassa there with some other of the Turks Captaines and Commanders, entered into consultation what to doe with these so fit instruments for the troubling of the Christians, and the disturbing of the peace. To entertaine them he durst not, and to cast them off hee was loth; but yet purposing to vse them and to set them a worke as occasion should serue, he to prepare an enterance thereunto, by letters threatened them of Comora, that except they better kept the capitulations and articles of the late peace, they should shortly heare of new matters. But in the meane time letters were sent from the great Sultan to the Bassa of Buda, with charge, that although the Hungarians were reported to encrease their strength, hee should yet keep himselfe within his bounds, and to attempt nothing against them, except they should proceed to manifest force: in which case he should not faile by all lawfull meanes to reuenge himselfe. Which the Sultans minde once made knowne, the Turkes againe departed from Buda, most part of the great ordnance that they brought with them being carried backe againe to Sigeth. K

An assembly of the States of the vpper Hungary & the decrees by them here made.

But the States of Hungarie, beeing returned home from Presburg, and againe assembled, the foureteenth day of October, by their generall consent, decreed, That Tokay should againe bee joyned vnto their jurisdiction; and that the great ordnance throughout all the free cities should be remoued and carried home vnto the places whereunto they before belonged: That the Vayuod of Transyluania should be admonished not to seperat Transyluania from Hungarie: That the Bassa of Buda should bee warned for to keepe his Turks within their owne bounds: and that the Nobilitie of Hungarie should betime bee admonished with all their force to represse the Haiduckes, and all other their enemies. Howbeit the Haiduckes proceeding in their insolent outrages more than before, tooke certaine forts, and with fire, and sword spoyled many places of the Countrey, causing the people to sweare to be friends to them and the Turks, and enemies vnto the Germans and Wallons: and demanding of Humanoius the Crowne wherewith Bethlem had sometime beene rewarded from the Grand Seignior, had a purpose to haue crowned him, or some other for their King: who for all that, by a messenger sent word vnto them, that hee would not at their hands accept that dignitie, but faithfully continue in his allegeance toward the Emperour. But when L

The Turks further the insolent attempts of the Haiducks.

A when the States of the vpper Hungarie were about to haue gone against these seditious and rebellious people to haue surprised them; they were from so doing deterred by the Bassa of Agria, threatening with his Turkes and Tartars to take their parts if they should once take vp armes against them.

About the same time six hundred Haiducks going to the castle of Saint Andrew, and coming thither, could not be let in by the garrison souldiers, as they had desired; and perceiuing them to make no reckoning of their seruice, could no longer hold, but openly professed themselues to become the great Sultans seruants: who from thence marching to Budnoc, tooke it by force, and ransacked it: and so still seeking after bootie, ran out towards Tockay, where by the way they were in a strait by Humanoius, lying in wait for them, entrapped, and B almost all slaine; who afterward sent two of the Turks Enlignes, taken from them, to Vienna, and to the the terrour of others, empailed some of them vpon stakes, being brought prisoners to Cassouia. For which vnfortunat expedition, some other of the Haiducks lighting vpon two of the Captains, who by chance had escaped out of Humanoius his hands, put them both to death for the euil leading of their fellowes, hanging vp the one, and with their swords hewing the other all to pieces. Now by the report of some of the prisoners there taken, it was C known this new rebellion of the Haiducks to haue bin railed by the procurement of the Baiasaes of Buda and Agria, who by their messengers had promised vnto them all helpe. Which report to haue been true, the euent did shortly after confirme: for the 27 day of Nouember almost 15000 of these Haiducks hauing before receiued from the great Sultan 300000 ducats for pay, came and most straightly besieged Filek, a strong castle, the Turks sending them great ordnance from Agria; vnto whom these Haiducks had promised to deliuer all such places as they should win. Howbeit, the euent of this siege answered not to their desire: for Thomas Bosnias, Captaine of Filek, with his garrison all of Germane souldiers, so valiantly repulsed them, and the extremitie of the Winter weather so distressed them, that they were glad to rayse their siege, and be gone.

A great fire at Constantinople.

Now much about the same time, viz. about the beginning of Nouember, a great fire arose at Constantinople, wherein almost fiue hundred shops of wares with many other faire buildings were burnt, so that the harme there by fire done was esteemed to amount to aboue two millions of gold.

An assembly of the States of Austria, and the Emperours demands therein.

D At the same time that the assembly of the States of Hungarie should haue beene holden at Presburg (as is before declared) the Emperor had appointed also another assembly of the nobilitie and States of Austria to be holden at Vienna; where after they were assembled, certain articles were vnto them on the Emperors behalfe propounded for them in that assembly then to consider of: as first, that for the keeping of the frontiers of Austria in quiet, the contribution by them graunted amongst themselues the last yeare, should this yeare following bee doubled. Then, that if it should fortune the enemie to attempt any thing of new against that Prouince, that in stead of the horses and money which they were woont to send vnto the warres, they should for the space of twelue moneths, or of the greatest part thereof, as occasion should require, of their owne costs maintaine ten companies of German footmen, euery E ry companie beeing three hundred strong; and as many troupes of German horsemen, euery troupe consisting of an hundred horse. And, that if for the better defence of the borders of Austria there should happily need a greater strength, the same should be raised in no other sort than was vsed in Hungarie, nor at greater charges maintained. And, that if it should continue peace, these charges should be conuerted to the payment of the souldiers wages: And that the States and other subiects of that Prouince should so much as might be, be eased from the trouble of sending either of horse or foot for the defence of the frontiers. Thirdly, that Commissaries should be maintained this yeare also to attend the armie, and certaine skilfull Captaines appointed for the chusing of a fit Generall for the armie. That diligent regard and care should be had for the prouision of corne and victuals for the vse of the people in F generall, as well in the time of peace as of warre. And that forasmuch as it much concerned the good of the Common-weale, to haue the frontiers of the Countrey toward Canisia diligently viewed, for feare of the Turkes great garrison there still lying, that therefore certaine good and expert souldiers, which knew those places well, should bee chosen, choſen, who together with the Deputies of the Emperour, Hungarians, and Stirians, riding about theſe confines, ſhould forthwith conſider what were beſt to be done for the ſafety thereof. In briefe, ſeeing that of the ſafetie of Rab, the welfare of the citie of Vienna and of the forts thereabouts depended, that for the repairing of the fortifications thereof, and the better ſtrengthening of the ſame, the ſumme of foure thouſand florens ſhould be appointed: and for the defence of the frontiers of Auſtria from the incurſion of the Turks gariſon of Caniſia, fiue thouſand: and for the furthering of the buildings at Nuſtorfe, fiue thouſand moe ſhould bee paied: and that thoſe who hitherto had beene ſlacke in paying of their contribution money, ſhould forthwith be enforced to pay the ſame. And alſo that it might be conſidered of, how that too much inhauncing of the value of monies might be reſtrained: that good orders might be kept, all the countrie cleered from the roberies of the ſouldiers, ſtragling hee and there vp and downe the ſame: that the counterfeit Hungarian and Polonian mony ſhould be prohibited, as not currant: that good order might be taken for the ſtaying of the Plague, which then began in many places in Auſtria. G H

The aſſembly broken vp, and nothing concluded.

Concerning which Articles, when as the States there aſſembled complained, all that countrie to be with the long wars againſt the Turke, the incurſions of the Rebels, and the outrages of the mutinous ſouldiers, already almoſt exhauſted, and miſerably bared of money; no reſolution could then, according as the neceſſitie required, be made, but was vnto a further time deferred, and the aſſemblie broken vp.

A Diet of the Empire by the Emperour appointed at Ratiſbone.

The Emperour at the ſame time appointed a Diet of the Empire to bee holden at Ratiſbone: wherein he hauing appointed Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria, to be chiefe in his place, he with a notable traine of ſeuen hundred horſe, and a gallant guard of footmen, came thither the eighth and twentieth of Nouember, and was there by the citiſens honourably receiued. Vnto which aſſemblie, when as the Deputies of the Electors, and of the other Princes and Cities of the empire, were in great number come, at length the twelfth of Ianuary Diuine ſeruice beeing done in the Cathedrall Church, Ferdinand the Archduke, with his Courtiers, the Emperours Counſellors, and other the Princes deputies being there preſent, taking horſe before the Church, with a great companie of the Nobilitie and princes deputies following of him, went to the Court, the citiſens in their armes ſtanding on both ſides: where Godfrey Ortelius the Emperours Secretarie hauing in a notable Oration ſet forth the Emperours loue and and affection towards the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire; and why, the Emperor himſelfe could not be preſent at this aſſemblie, as willingly he would haue been; he propounded in his name fiue articles for them in this their aſſemblie to be eſpecially conſidered of. I K

The articles by the Emperour propounded to be conſidered of in the Diet of the Empire at Ratiſbone.

First, how the Empire might hereafter be preſerued and defended againſt the violence of the Turks, and the dangerous rebellions by their procurement ſtirred vp in Hungarie, to the endangering of the whole Empire; eſpecially ſeeing that the Turkes themſelues (with whome the peace was of late concluded) by their doings had heretofore more than ſufficiently declared what truſt or credit was to bee giuen vnto them: and ſeeing that it is moſt manifeſt, them therein to haue ſought for nothing elſe, than that hauing made or rather counterfeited a peace with the Chriſtians for a time, for the ſuppreſſing of the Rebels, and the repreſſing of the inuaſions of the Perſians, they might after ſuch victorie againſt them obtained, come better prouided, and ſtronger to ouercome the Chriſtians. Which was eaſie to bee ſeeene: for that whileſt they were yet intreating of peace, they had taken Strigonium, and hauing concluded peace, they ceaſed not as yet with their counſell and aid to helpe the Rebels in their rebellious tumults: which was manifeſtly to bee perceiued by the Haiduckes themſelues, who were not aſhamed openly to profeſſe themſelues to bee the Great Sultans ſeruants, to require Cities and fortreſſes to bee yeelded vnto the Sultan, and to conſpire againſt the verie name of the Germanes. For the ſpeedie remedie of which miſchiefe, the Emperour had thought good, that conſideration of this point ſhould ſo bee had, as that the Princes ſhould either conſent vnto a certaine ſtanding and perpetuall contribution, whereby a ſufficient ſtrength might alwaies bee readie, wherewith to withſtand the enemies attempts: or elſe that for certaine yeares twentie thouſand footmen and foure thouſand horſe might there bee ſtill in readineſſe, to bee maintained at the common charges of the Empire; which the Emperour (needs ſo requiring) might vſe againſt the common enemie. Or that if this were L M

A were heauie or troubleſome vnto the States of the Empire, yet at leaſt they ſhould conſent yearely to contribute ſuch money as might ſuffice for the ſuſtayning of ſuch a power. Another poynt of this concluſion, was about the correcting and reforming of the adminiſtration of Iuſtice in the Imperiall Chamber. For ſeeing that in the former aſſemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reaſon of certaine hinderances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due adminiſtration and execution of Iuſtice no Empire could long ſtand or flouriſh, no more than the World could without the Sunne; his Imperiall Maieſtie therefore would not haue the deliberation of this ſo neceſſarie a point to be put off or referred vnto any other aſſemblie, but to bee done and concluded in this preſent aſſemblie. The third point to be conſidered of, was the warre which
B hath beene now ſo many yeares made in the Low-Countries, and the inconueniencie thereof redounding vnto the Empire. For whereas in the treatie of peace in the Low-Countries, (at which treatie both hee and the whole Empire ought to haue beene there preſent) for the better concluding and ending of the ſame, hee had heard the confederate Princes to bee now acknowledged for a free State, he could not now any longer (as he ſaid) forbeare, but that (ſeeing the Low-Countries to bee a member and fee of the Empire, and by the antient Records of the Empire, and of the Emperors, and by many other proofes it appeareth, the Gouernours of the Low-Countries to haue beene vaſſals of the Empire) hee ſhould by Letters which were written vnto the King of Spaine, the Archduke Albertus, and the States of the confederate Prouinces, admoniſh them, That they ſhould not proceed to doe or deter-
C mine any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or preiudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the houſe of Auſtria. And foraſmuch as that warre in the Low-Countries had hitherto done no ſmall harme vnto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed vpon betweene the parties, and that it ſhould happen the ſame warre to be any longer continued, or rather againe renewed, it ſhould then bee conſidered vpon, how the Empire might bee ſatisfied for the great harme it had vntill this preſent thereby receiued, and how it might be from the like harme hereafter kept and preſerued. The fourth point in this conſultation, which was to be conſidered of, concerned the coyne. For whereas it is manifeſt, that the value of the money to bee dayly more and more inhaunced and rayſed, and that thereby not onely the Magiſtrates in the publique receipt, but the ſubiects alſo in ge-D nerall receiued great and manifeſt harme, foraſmuch as the price of ſuch neceſſarie things which wee muſt in this life haue ordinarie vſe of, muſt of neceſſitie bee ſtill more and more encreaſed, according to the value of the money, the Emperour thought good with mature deliberation to remedie this miſchiefe in this preſent aſſemblie of the Empire. The fifth and laſt point which was to be conſidered vpon, was the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giuing vnto euerie man that which of due belongeth vnto him: the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would haue in this aſſemblie to bee amongſt them conſidered of.

Which articles thus propounded, there fell a great controuerſie amongſt the Deputies of the Princes concerning the manner of their proceeding in theſe matters: as whether they
E ſhould conſider of theſe articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, or otherwiſe. And when as many thought it beſt firſt to conſider of the article, for the reformation of Iuſtice, beeing the ſecond article propounded to be conſidered of, and afterwards to come vnto the reſt of the articles to be afterward conſulted of: when as the two and twentieth day of Ianuarie they came againe to Counſell, a writing was by the Emperours commaund read vnto them, whereby it was ſignified vnto the States of the Empire; the rebellious tumults by Botſcay and ſome others rayſed in Hungarie to bee yet by the Haiduckes continued, the Sultan himſelfe ſending of them rewards, and furniſhing them with ordnance and other things neceſſarie for the warres, by the Gouernour of Agria, and the Baſſa of Buda, threatening all extremities vnto them which ſhould goe about to reſiſt them; and then augmenting the dan-F ger which thereby might enſue vnto the Empire, and eſpecially vnto the Germane name, ſeeing that it was manifeſt thoſe rebellious Haiduckes to haue eſpecially conſpired the deſtruction of the Germanes, and to haue confirmed that their league, by drinking of an health: It was requeſted, that leauing off theſe contentions, for the manner of their proceeding, they would

to be by any man made or done vnto the Hungarians, or the countries thereabout, for the aforesaid articles of Pacification, which they had determined religiously to keepe, that they would forthwith with their vnited forces come to aid their confederat brethren, and together with them to liue or die.

With these letters signed and sealed with the hand of the Archduke, and of the Noblemen there present, the first of February, Illishaschius with George Turson, were sent vnto the tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their messages to be sent vnto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to craue their aid) to dissuade them from such their purpose, and to persuade them to quietnes; threatening them withall, That if they would not hearken vnto such honest conditions, they should all together, and at once, be set vpon and oppressed by the whole power of the States.

The States of Austria commanded by the Archduke Mathias to be alwaies in a readinesse against the Haiduckes.

The Assemblie at Presburg thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to Vienna, and forthwith calling together the States of Enseric, declared vnto them all that was done in the Assemblie at Presburg. And for as much as that assemblie was chiefely to that end appointed, That the kingdome of Hungarie should not altogether be pluckt away from the Empire; and that after the reuolt thereof, the greatest harme to be done by the incursions and spoyling of the enemies, would lie vpon the countries of Austria; he aduised them so to looke vnto themselues, and carefully to prouide for the Commonweale, as that hauing money alwaies in readinesse to maintaine an armie, they might with all conuenient speed go to meet with the Haiducks, if haply they would not conforme themselues vnto the articles of Pacification, but againe raise new broiles; that so they might defend and preserue their countrey from their outrages.

The Prince of Valachia dieth; whose widow notably preserueth the Country for her sonne.

About the beginning of this Spring, when as Ieromie Prince of Valachia was dead, leauing behinde him a sonne but thirteene yeares old, the Emperour admitted him, as yet not capable of the gouernment, vnder Tutors, vnto the succession of his heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no meanes willing to endure, and bearing themselues vpon the helpe of the Turks, went about to make choice of another in stead of their Prince of late dead. For which cause, the Princesse widow by letters certified Pollosie her sonne in law, of this outrage and injurie of her subiects: and hauing obtained of him a great summe of money, and therewith raised an armie of ten thousand good souldiers, went forth against the Valachians, and in open field ouercame them in so bloudie and terrible a battel, that hauing slaine fiue thousand of the Valachians and Turks, she had ouer them a notable victorie, and by that meanes preserued the principalitie of that Countrey for her sonne.

The Great Duke of Florence had of late done great harme with his fleet vnto the Turks in the Mediterranean sea: for which cause a Messenger about this time comming vnto him in the Great Sultans name, promised him great matters, if he would from thenceforth forbeare to hurt and pursue the Turkes Gallies. Which his request serued the Turkes to no other purpose, but as it were to put oyle vnto the fire. For the Duke afterward caused new gallies to be made, and his fleet encreased, and therewith did more harme than formerly he had done.

The Haiduckes refuse to admit of the Pacification made at Situatorok.

Now although that after the ending of the Assemblie at Presburg, Illishaschius and George Turson had deliuered vnto the Haiduckes the Articles of the Pacification, and commaunded them from thencefoorth to keepe themselues quiet; yet for all that, could they not yet be persuaded to hearken vnto such their counsell: for that they being men still accustomed to the warres, and liuing by their swords, could not endure to fall to husbandrie, and such other labours. For which cause they of the Countrey about Gymeric, writ vnto them which dwelt in the Countrey about Nusol, letters to this effect: That forasmuch as they beeing diuers times certified of the miserable estate of their neighbors, had refused to come to ayd them, they should yet now remember how necessarie a thing it were, with their conjoined mindes and forces to helpe one another; for that the Haiduckes hauing now passed the riuer of Teise, were broken into that Prouince, and were runne as farre as Budnoc: neither were they minded to stay, but to robbe and spoyle all the Countrey before them, if they were not with speed encountered. And the rather, for that but a few dayes before, they had receiued three thousand Hungarian Duckets from

from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with horses and other gifts to be diuided among their Leaders and Captaines: and moreouer, dayly expected aid from the Tartars, whom in great number lay about Belgrade. Wherefore seeing it could not be expressed, what great harme and losse was by the Haiducks done, as well vnto the Noblemen themselues, as to the common countreymen; that they should therefore thereof giue their Neighbours to vnderstand, and with all speed to take vp armes against the same rebellious Haiducks.

Not long after, about the latter end of March, Proclamation was made by the commandement of Matthias the Archduke, throughout all Austria, That euery man should prouide himselfe to take vp armes. The cause whereof men diuersly suspected: howbeit that vnto this Proclamation was this reason joyned, That the Archduke was determined himselfe to go about the fourteenth of Aprill into Morauia, and there to gather together all his power, as well Hungarians, as Austrians and Haiduckes, for the warre hee was to take in hand. There were also Letters in the Archdukes name sent vnto the Vassals of Austria, to giue them to vnderstand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of peace, and defence of these Countries, had of late beene decreed at Presburg; and that all the States of Enseric had approoued the report thereof receiued from their Deputies, and so promised their helpe and aid vnto the Archduke, as if that he himselfe would take in hand any expedition, they would joyne themselues vnto him, and together with him to liue or die: yet that there were some, which being more desirous of war than peace, did not onely not rest vpon the former pacification, but gathered an armie also in the borders of Morauia; with a purpose to make an inroad as well into Morauia, as into Austria it selfe. For which cause the States of Morauia also were enforced, for defence of themselues to raise an armie, and to craue helpe from their Neighbours. And that therefore seeing the Archduke, mindefull of his promise for the common defence of the Countrey, was resolued to bestow his life and all his fortunes, and in his own person to vndertake an expedition vnto those places from whence the greatest danger was to be feared to fall vpon those countries; necessitie then required, that the States themselues also should suffer nothing to be wanting on their behalfe, but euery one of them together with their seruants forthwith to joyne themselues vnto the Archduke, and to the vttermost of their power to endeauor themselues to deliuer them and theirs from death and destruction. That God, in whose name this expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the louers of peace, might so in short time make an end of all tumults, and grant vnto those Countries wished peace and quietnesse. And that therefore they were to be admonished, That according to the tenor of the Decree made at Presburg, they with such a number of horse and foot as they could vpon the sudden raise at a day to be shortly after vnto them named, should joyne themselues vnto the Archduke, and not to suffer any thing to let them in so doing. So that if haply any chance or sickenesse should happen vnto their General, yet notwithstanding that they should send their power vnder the leading of some other man, seeing that the Archduke himselfe spared not to aduenture his life and fortunes, and (if God should see it so good) account it a great gaine euen to lose the same, so that thereby he might doe his countrey good.

The States of Austria warned by the Archduke to prepare themselues for an expedition to be made into Morauia.

The Archduke Matthias prepareth himselfe for his expedition into Morauia.

About the beginning of April, the Cardinal returning from Prague to Vienna, brought with him the Emperors answer and resolution, viz. That he did ratifie and confirme all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks; but that his will was, That the confederation made betwixt the States of Hungarie and Austria at Presburg, should be void and of none effect. Which the Archduke protesting that he could by no meanes like of, or suffer to be done, he the 15 of Aprill afterwards with a great number of the Peeres, Nobilitie, and Counsellours, and a multitude of good souldiers, going out of Vienna towards the monasterie of Neoburg, set forward vpon his journey, carrying with him eight and twentie pieces of ordnance, there expecting his souldiers in all places leuied: by publique Letters protesting, That no man should from his armie receiue any harme; or if that by chance any harme were done vnto any man by his armie, assuring his subiects it should be againe vnto them restored and recompensed.

But the rumor of this expedition being brought into Bohemia, the Nobilitie of the Countrey began to assemble themselues the fifteenth day of April; whither when as many of the deputies to be by any man made or done vnto the Hungarians, or the countries thereabout, for the aforesaid articles of Pacification, which they had determined religiously to keepe, that they would forthwith with their vnited forces come to aid their confederat brethren, and together with them to liue or die. G

With these letters signed and sealed with the hand of the Archduke, and of the Noblemen there present, the first of February, Illisbaschius with George Turson, were sent vnto the tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their messages to be sent vnto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to craue their aid) to dissuade them from such their purpose, and to persuade them to quietnes; threatening them withall, That if they would not hearken vnto such honest conditions, they should all together, and at once, be set vpon and oppressed by the whole power of the States.

The States of Austrec commanded by the Archduke Mathias to be alwaies in a readinesse against the Haiduckes.

The Assemblie at Presburg thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to Vienna, and forthwith calling together the States of Enseric, declared vnto them all that was done in the Assemblie at Presburg. And for as much as that assemblie was chiefely to that end appointed, That the kingdome of Hungarie should not altogether be pluckt away from the Empire; and that after the reuolt thereof, the greatest harme to be done by the incursions and spoyling of the enemies, would lie vpon the countries of Austria; he aduised them so to looke vnto themselues, and carefully to prouide for the Commonweale, as that hauing money alwaies in readinesse to maintaine an armie, they might with all conuenient speed go to meet with the Haiducks, if haply they would not conforme themselues vnto the articles of Pacification, but againe raise new broiles; that so they might defend and preserue their countrey from their outrages. H I

About the beginning of this Spring, when as Ierome Prince of Valachia was dead, leauing behinde him a sonne but thirteene yeares old, the Emperour admitted him, as yet not capable of the gouernment, vnder Tutors, vnto the succession of his heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no meanes willing to endure, and bearing themselues vpon the helpe of the Turks, went about to make choice of another in stead of their Prince of late dead. For which cause, the Princesse widow by letters certified Pollosie her sonne in law, of this outrage and injurie of her subiects: and hauing obtained of him a great summe of money, and therewith raised an armie of ten thousand good souldiers, went forth against the Valachians, and in open field ouercame them in so bloudie and terrible a battel, that hauing slaine fiue thousand of the Valachians and Turks, she had ouer them a notable victorie, and by that meanes preserued the principalitie of that Countrey for her sonne. K

The Great Duke of Florence had of late done great harme with his fleet vnto the Turks in the Mediterranean sea: for which cause a Messenger about this time comming vnto him in the Great Sultans name, promised him great matters, if he would from thenceforth forbeare to hurt and pursue the Turkes Gallies. Which his request serued the Turkes to no other purpose, but as it were to put oyle vnto the fire. For the Duke afterward caused new gallies to be made, and his fleet encreased, and therewith did more harme than formerly he had done.

The Haiduckes refuse to admit of the Pacification made at Vienna.

Now although that after the ending of the Assemblie at Presburg, Illisbaschius and George Turson had deliuered vnto the Haiduckes the Articles of the Pacification, and commaunded them from thencefoorth to keepe themselues quiet; yet for all that, could they not yet be persuaded to hearken vnto such their counsell: for that they being men still accustomed to the warres, and liuing by their swords, could not endure to fall to husbandrie, and such other labours. For which cause they of the Countrey about Gymeric, writ vnto them which dwelt in the Countrey about Nusol, letters to this effect: That forasmuch as they beeing diuers times certified of the miserable estate of their neighbors, had refused to come to ayd them, they should yet now remember how necessarie a thing it were, with their conjoined mindes and forces to helpe one another; for that the Haiduckes hauing now passed the riuer of Teise, were broken into that Prouince, and were runne as farre as Budnoc: neither were they minded to stay, but to robbe and spoyle all the Countrey before them, if they were not with speed encountered. And the rather, for that but a few dayes before, they had receiued thirty thousand Hungarian Duckets from L M from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with horses and other gifts to be diuided among their Leaders and Captaines: and moreouer, dayly expected aid from the Tartars, who in great number lay about Belgrade. Wherefore seeing it could not be expressed, what great harme and losse was by the Haiducks done, as well vnto the Noblemen themselues, as to the common countreymen; that they should therefore thereof giue their Neighbours to vnderstand, and with all speed to take vp armes against the same rebellious Haiducks. A

Not long after, about the latter end of March, Proclamation was made by the commandement of Matthias the Archduke, throughout all Austria, That euery man should prouide himselfe to take vp armes. The cause whereof men diuersly suspected: howbeit that vnto this Proclamation was this reason joyned, That the Archduke was determined himselfe to go about the fourteenth of Aprill into Morauia, and there to gather together all his power, as well Hungarians, as Austrians and Haiduckes, for the warre hee was to take in hand. There were also Letters in the Archdukes name sent vnto the Vassals of Austria, to giue them to vnderstand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of peace, and defence of these Countries, had of late beene decreed at Presburg; and that all the States of Enseric had approoued the report thereof receiued from their Deputies, and so promised their helpe and aid vnto the Archduke, as if that he himselfe would take in hand any expedition, they would joyne themselues vnto him, and together with him to liue or die: yet that there were some, which being more desirous of war than peace, did not onely not rest vpon the former pacification, but gathered an armie also in the borders of Morauia; with a purpose to make an inroad as well into Morauia, as into Austria it selfe. For which cause the States of Morauia also were enforced, for defence of themselues to raise an armie, and to craue helpe from their Neighbours. And that therefore seeing the Archduke, mindefull of his promise for the common defence of the Countrey, was resolued to bestow his life and all his fortunes, and in his own person to vndertake an expedition vnto those places from whence the greatest danger was to be feared to fall vpon those countries; necessitie then required, that the States themselues also should suffer nothing to be wanting on their behalfe, but euery one of them together with their seruants forthwith to joyne themselues vnto the Archduke, and to the vttermost of their power to endeauor themselues to deliuer them and theirs from death and destruction. That God, in whose name this expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the louers of peace, might so in short time make an end of all tumults, and grant vnto those Countries wished peace and quietnesse. And that therefore they were to be admonished, That according to the tenor of the Decree made at Presburg, they with such a number of horse and foot as they could vpon the sudden raise at a day to be shortly after vnto them named, should joyne themselues vnto the Archduke, and not to suffer any thing to let them in so doing. So that if haply any chance or sickenesse should happen vnto their General, yet notwithstanding that they should send their power vnder the leading of some other man, seeing that the Archduke himselfe spared not to aduenture his life and fortunes, and (if God should see it so good) account it a great gaine euen to lose the same, so that thereby he might doe his countrey good. B C D E

About the beginning of April, the Cardinal returning from Prague to Vienna, brought with him the Emperors answer and resolution, viz. That he did ratifie and confirme all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks; but that his will was, That the confederation made betwixt the States of Hungarie and Austria at Presburg, should be voide and of none effect. Which the Archduke protesting that he could by no meanes like of, or suffer to be done, he the 15 of Aprill afterwards with a great number of the Peeres, Nobilitie, Counsellours, and a multitude of good souldiers, going out of Vienna towards the Citie of Neoburg, set forward vpon his journey, carrying with him eight and twentie peeces of ordnance, there expecting his souldiers in all places leuied: by publique Letters signifying That no man should from his armie receiue any harme; or if that by chance any thing were done vnto any man by his armie, assuring his subiects it should be againe restored and recompensed. F

But the rumor of this expedition being brought into Bohemia, the Nobilitie of that Countrey began to assemble themselues the fifteenth day of April; whither deputies of the other Countries were assembled also, it beeing decreed, That the Nobilitie of the faithfull States there present, should with all speed returne home, and so prouide themselues and their subiects of necessarie armes; that, need so requiring, they should therewith be able to defend themselues and their countrey, the assembly was dismissed. Besides that, the Emperour himselfe carefull for all euents, caused many both horse and foot, to be brought to Prague, and to be diuersly bilited in the citizens houses: and furthermore, the eighteenth of Aprill, by letters directed vnto certaine Princes of the Empire, and to certaine Earles also, citizens, and other vassals of the Kingdome of Bohemia, warned them with all speed to send aid vnto him at Prague.

The Archduke Matthias with an armie commeth to Zname in Morauia.

But Matthias the Archduke in the meane time marching forward with an armie of twentie thousand horse and foot, the foure and twentieth day of Aprill came to Zname a citie of Morauia; and was there, by the States of Morauia (who the day before were come thither also with foure hundred horse) honourably receiued and brought into the citie. From thence sending out letters into the territories of Bohemia, and to the citie of Prague, hee requested, That they would send out of euery place two deputies for them, vnto the assemblie to be holden at Zaslauia, the fourth day of May: promising withall, That hee himselfe there beeing present, would yeeld vnto their deputies a reason of his doings, as also what he meant to do hereafter. Besides that, hee by letters sent vnto the Electors and other Princes of the Empire, declared the cause why hee was enforced to make this expedition: and withall sending vnto them a copie of the agreement made at Vienna, the fiue and twentieth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1606, by the common consent of the Archdukes; in most friendly manner requested them, That they would not intermeddle in this businesse but rather with their counsell and aid to further the same.

The Emperour sendeth embassadours to the Archduke Mathias at Zname

But the three and twentieth day of Aprill, the Emperour sent the Popes Embassadors, with the Embassadours of diuers other Princes and States, then lying at Prague with sundrie of the Bohemian Ministers, in Embassage to the Archduke Matthias, still lying at Zname: whom the Cardinal the next day after followed also, to make some good pacification, if it were possible, with the Archduke. But the Emperor in the meane time calling vnto him the counsellors of the old and new towne of Prague (contrarie to his woonted manner) most courteously with his owne hand receiued them, and giuing them thanks for the faithfull duties by them hitherto performed; requested them, That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelitie and loyaltie also: most liberally promising vnto them all kindnesse, with the restitution of the priuiledges concerning the shutting of the gates of the citie: which libertie they had before lost in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. And not long after, a general muster was taken, not only in the Citie of Prague, and the townes thereabouts, but also throughout all the Kingdome of Bohemia, and three hundred musketiers appointed for the gard and keeping of the castle, vnder the command of Count Solmes, who had commission for the raising of other souldiers also.

The Tartar Cham dieth.

At the verie same time it was from Constantinople certainely reported, the Tartar Cham to haue dyed, and the Turkish Sultan hauing receiued newes thereof, to haue dismissed his sonne, whome hee hitherto had detained as a pledge, and with diuers ships and gallies, to haue caused him to bee transported ouer the Blacke Sea, vnto the borders of Tartarie, there to take possession of his fathers Kingdome. It was also then reported, certaine of the seditious Turkes making of a road, to haue surprised Smirna, a rich Citie of Asia, and to haue forraged all the Countrey about it farre and neere, and comming vnto Magnesia, a chiefe Citie of that Countrey, to haue had ten thousand crownes by the inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to spare the Countrey thereabouts. The Persian King also at the same time notably to proceed in his warres, and to doe the Turkes great harme, the Turkes and Tartars seeking in vaine to withstand him.

The seditious Turkes raise new stirres in the lesser Asia, and spoil Smirna with the countrie thereabouts.

Embassadours sent from the Electours of Saxony and of Brandenbourg, for the appeasing of the trouble betwixt the Emperour and Matthias.

In the meane time Embassadours comming vnto Prague from the Electors of Saxonie and Brandenburg, part of them the ninth of May, went vnto the Archduke Matthias to Zaslauia, who still lay there encamped with an armie of fiue and twentie thousand men: of whome they requesting a truce for the space of eight dayes, for the making of a pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this businesse, easily obtained the same, especially seeing that those Princes Electors, being ioyned and bound vnto the Emperour

A rour in a double confederation, as well for their Electorship, as in respect of the Kingdome of Bohemia, could not, as they said, otherwise do, but send present aid vnto the Emperor, his necessitie so requiring; to which end they had now in readinesse certaine thousands of souldiors in the frontiers of their countries, to be forthwith sent vnto him: The other part of these Embassadors in the meane time staying with the Emperor, where after the Germane manner they were well prouided of good cheere and wine.

Matthias the Archduke marcheth towards Prague.

About the seuenteenth of May Matthias the Archduke with eighteene thousand men rose and marched towards Prague, Collonitz with the rest of the armie following him. And although that the Archduke had seuerely commanded his souldiers to abstaine from robbing, spoyling, and burning of the country, and had diuers times seuerely punished some offendors therein, by hanging of some, and heading of others, yet could he by no meanes so restraine them, and keepe them in, but that some of them would sometimes be straggling abroad, and doing harme, especially the Hungarians, who were still running out euen as far as the Emperours campe, and the new citie of Prague. Whom for all that, the Emperors souldiers (being then twentie thousand strong) would not meddle withall, being so commanded by the Emperor. Howbeit some of these straglers going too far abroad into the country, were by the country-men cut off and slaine.

An assembly of the States of Bohemia, holden at Prague in the presence of the Emperour.

The three and twentieth day of May an assemblie of the States of Bohemia was called at Prague, the Emperor himselfe being there present; Adam Waldsteine carrying the drawen sword before him. In which assemblie the Nobilitie and States of the countrey with one consent promised to spend their goods and liues in the Emperors quarrell; yet in the meane time requesting these things following to be granted and confirmed vnto them: viz. That Religion according to the confession of Bohemia and Augusta should inuiolately be kept, and that they which professed the one, should not therefore scoffe or despise the other. That Bohemians only should be preferred to Archbishopricks, Abbotships, and other spirituall preferments. That the Archbishop should not meddle with ciuile and politicall affaires. That Ecclesiastical offices should be permitted vnto the Protestant Ministers, as in former time, the Catholickes in the meane time holding that they had. That the Pontificial dispensation in causes of Matrimonie, according to the Decree of the assembly holden in the yere 1602, should be abrogated and taken away. That it should not be lawfull for Priests and other Ecclesiastical persons to buy lands or territories, without the expresse consent of all the three States. they in any wise requested the Emperour, that it would please him to ease the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia of these grieses, before they were compelled to answer vnto such things as were to be propounded vnto them on his behalfe. Who easily granted vnto most of these articles, those which concerned Religion only excepted; so that the Senators of the old town of Prague obtained the desired sword to be againe forthwith set in the wonted place. But as for the businesse of Religion, it was altogether put off and deferred vnto the next assemblie to be holden at the feast of Saint Michael.

Matthias the Archdukes embassadors come to Prague.

About the end of May the Archduke Matthias his Embassadors hauing receiued safe conduct from the Emperor and the nobilitie of the kingdome of Bohemia, came to Prague: and being admitted into the councell of the Nobilitie, Charles Count Tserotin to whome that charge was giuen, hauing in the Archdukes name first saluted the Nobilitie, declared what hee and the rest had in charge, to be before them out of a long writing in the Bohemian tongue read: which done, when as, the Nobilitie so requiring, they were put aside, and almost an houre after were called againe, they receiued answer, That the points of the Embassage by them propounded, were greater and of more weight than that sufficient deliberation could thereof in so short a time be had; and that therefore it was by the Nobilitie thought meet, that Commissioners on both sides meeting together in the open field neere vnto Debritse should there consult of these articles, and by the consent of the Emperor and Archduke to do what they might to end the matter: Vnto which answer the Archdukes Embassadors consenting, the ninth of Iune returned againe vnto the campe. The Emperours Embassadors within two dayes after with fortie coaches and an hundred horse following them vnto the place appointed: wo oftentimes going to and fro, at length so wrought the matter on both sides, that the businesse quietly and friendly ended, they were againe made friends.

Commissioners appointed for the ending of the troubles betwixt the Emperor and Matthias the Archduke.

The articles of which pacification and agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Archduke were the seuenteenth day of Iune in the castle of Prage openly read in the Bohemian tongue, Lichtenstein, Kintskie, and other Chiefetaines the Archdukes Embassadours, being there present, in order thus:

The Articles of pacification betwixt the Emperour and the Archduke Matthias.

That the Emperour refused not, but that the Crowne of Hungarie should be deliuered into the Archduke Matthias his hands: and to yeeld vnto him the Kingdome of Hungarie, and to remit vnto his subjects the oath of their allegeance before giuen vnto him, so that the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie should chuse no other King but the Archduke. That in the next Dyet of the Empire, he should propound vnto the States of the Empire to be considered of, what contribution they ought to make vnto the Archduke for the defence of their frontiers, if happely longer warre were to be made with the Turke. That hee should cause the Writings which concerned that Kingdome of Hungarie, within the space of two months to be deliuered vnto the Archduke. That he should likewise also surrender vp the Archdukedome of Austria, by himselfe hitherto possessed, vnto the Archduke: yet so as that the Archduke should take vpon himselfe all the Emperours debt as well in Hungarie as in Austria, and within a yeare should cause sufficient Recognizance or Caution sealed with his owne hand, to be deliuered vnto the Creditors. That hee should cause all the Letters and Writings, as well concerning the vpper Austria, as the nether, within the same time to be deliuered vnto him, together with a Copie of the Priuiledges therein, vntill that deliberation might be had concerning them, to be transferred vnto him also. That the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia should in the Emperors name ratifie and confirme the Treatie held at Vienna, for the making of the peace betwixt the Emperour, the Turkes, and the Hungarians. That they also should not refuse at the Emperours request, to promise vnto the Archduke a certaine succession into the Kingdome of Bohemia; but yet with condition, so that if it should happen the Emperour to die without heires male, before the death of the Archduke his brother: but if hee should haue heires male lawfully begotten and vnder age: that in that ease he should onely haue the rule and gouernment of the Kingdome of Bohemia, yet with certaine Bohemian Councellors joyned vnto him. That the Archduke should by writing confirme vnto the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia, That hee should after the vsual manner and fashion demand the kingdome of Bohemia, being void of a King. That he should take the vsual oath of a King, & alwaies haue like regard of all their priuiledges as the other Kings his his predecessours had. That the States of Bohemia should not gainesay, but that the Archduke might hereafter vse the title of the designed King of Hungarie. That the administration of the Marquiset of Morauia should be granted vnto the Archduke Matthias and his heires, together with the title of a Marquesse, vntill that after the death of the Emperor this Prouince was againe to reuert vnto him which was to enioy the Kingdome of Bohemia. But if it should happen the Archduke to die before the Emperour, the States of Bohemia should not refuse, but that this Prouince separate apart, might (as should seeme good) chuse vnto it selfe a patron and defendour, vnto the death of the Emperour. That the Bishopricke of Almits, hitherto in temporalities subject vnto the King of Bohemia, should from thenceforth acknowledge the Archduke Matthias to be the Gouernour thereof, lest there should bee a confusion of suites in Morauia; the Bishop in the meane time hauing regard vnto his owne priuiledges. That the Emperour at the request of the Archduke should maintaine the priuiledges of them of Silesia, and of the States of the six Cities, and augment them also with new priuiledges, beeing reasonable and conuenient. That for the defence of the borders against the Turks, the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia should not contribute more than hitherto they were woont; yet sauing vnto the Archduke power and abilitie in the generall meetings and assemblies of the Kingdome to entreat thereof, as the Emperour had hitherto had. That the titles of all the Prouinces which the Emperor did now surrender vnto the Archduke Matthias, should be still vnto him reserued. That the Archduke Matthias should vtterly renounce the Countie of Tirali, and surrender his part thereof vnto the Emperour. That in the meetings and assemblies to come, the Archduke should by all meanes endeauour, that the Emperour should receiue a reasonable yearely contribution out of those Prouinces which hee now departed with. That all offences hitherto committed, should generally be forgiuen and pardoned, all and euerie the persons on both parties, onely Verkauions excepted, concerning whome, as also concerning his debt, the Nobilitie of Morauia had vndertaken in their next assemblie to take order. And that armes should on both sides bee layed apart.

Which articles thus agreed vpon, and on both parts accepted of, the Crowne of Hungarie, with the ornaments thereto belonging, such as are King Stephen his Sword, the golden Apple, with the Crosse of the Kingdome vpon it, two paire of rich shooes, a verie antient Robe, with a Royall Scepter, were by the Emperours chiefe Lieutenant carried into the campe, and there in a broad and open field deliuered vnto the Archduke Matthias: who with his armie in order raunged, and sixteene thousand horse and foot diuided into three battalions, after he had receiued these Royall ornaments, commanded three great vollies of shot to be discharged, and afterwards royally feasted the Emperours Embassadours. Which pacification thus made, many out of the Archdukes campe, but especially the Hungarians, went into the citie of Prague, there to buy things necessarie; and many came also out of the citie to see the Archdukes camp. But in the meantime certaine insolent souldiers hauing by night broken vp certaine shops of the Iewes, and carried out of them much rich wares, were the cause of great stirres and tumults in the Citie; insomuch, that diuers of the souldiers were therefore cast into prison.

The first of Iuly King Matthias rising with his armie, departed from before Prague, taking his way with his chiefe Counsellors towards Lintze, and diuiding his armie into three parts, that so they might the more easilier passe through those countries home. After the rising of which armie, a certaine noble Bohemian and a good souldier, called Cottouits, vnto whome the Hungarians and Haiduckes had in this expedition done great harme, with six hundered harquebusiers and a number of countreymen went foorth to a place called Partouitse; where hauing cut off the passage, and cut downe trees crosse the wayes, that none might that way conueniently passe, hee with such furie in a place of aduantage charged the Hungarians, comming that way, that hauing slaine about nine hundred of them, some others were also carried away prisoners, with a great bootie of horses, waggons, and other goods. With which deed the Hungarians grieued, trod downe the corne as they went, and began to set fire on the villages and houses in the Countrie thereabouts. But the newes thereof beeing brought vnto the King, hee forthwith by Herbenstein, Generall of the horsemen, commaunded the Hungarians and Haiduckes not onely to desist from [illegible] their insolencie, King Matthias departeth with his army out of Bohemia.

The Hungarians and Haiduckes by Cottouits slaine.

but themselues also, vpon a great penaltie, to helpe to quench the fires by them raised.

King Matthias entereth into Hungary, & is royally receiued into Vienna.

In the meane time the comming of king Matthias being reported at Vienna, great preparation was there made for the receiuing of him and bringing of him into the citie, according to his royall dignitie: who the fourteenth of Iuly toward night being come thither, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, and 3000 horse, the Archbishop of Hungarie, who with Count Trautsamius and many other the Emperors counsellors and seruants went out of the citie to meet him, and there amidst eight Ensignes of German souldiers, and 1500 horsemen, as it were set in order of battell, receiued him with a long & eloquent oration; as did afterwards Trautsamius in the name of the States of Austria; the Emperors Counsellors also honourably welcomming him. Which don, mounting again to horse, the King, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, stayed vntill that two troupes of the horsemen of Vienna, whereof them consisting of 200 horse (were all entred into the citie; and afterward, 150 Bucheime his horsemen and the aforesaid eight Ensignes of Germans going before, and the Emperors counsellors following them, the King himselfe with the Archduke his brother, and all his traine, set forward, and passing ouer the bridge, whereon three triumphall arches were most sumptuously erected, hee was by three thousand citizens of Vienna, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundering of the great ordnance and vollies of small shot, most magnificently receiued, diuers other triumphs and sports, to manifest the joy of the people, being there made also, which for breuitie sake we passe ouer. But being gone a little further, he was by the Senators of Vienna on horseback receiued vnder a rich Canopie, borne vp by six of the auntientest of the said Senatours, and so brought to Saint Stephens Church: whither hee was no sooner come, but that lighting from his horse, hee was there receiued by the whole Clergie, and vnder a Canopie brought into the Church: where, after Seruice done, he was with like triumph and magnificence, through diuers other triumphall arches, brought to the castle, the great ordnance on all sides still thundering off from the castle, the walls, and bulwarkes of the towne.

But these triumphs and solemnities ended, shortly after when as they began to consult about such things as concerned the good gouernment of the kingdome of Hungarie, and the crowning of the King, and that the Protestant States of Austria in many places began to exercise their Religion according to the manner of the Confession of Augusta, and that the Ministers began openly to preach in the Churches there, Leopold the Archduke and Bishop of Passauia comming to Vienna, with Caietanus the Popes Nuntio (but a little before come to Prague) with Cardinall Forgatsius and the Bishop of Vienna, with earnest and importunat soliciting of the king, obtained from him a commandement, That that exercise of religion should be againe abrogated, the Churches shut, and publique preaching forbidden. Which thing forthwith brought forth new stirs and troubles in Austria. For the Protestant States forthwith calling a counsell among themselues, by generall consent refused by oath of loyaltie and alleageance to binde themselues vnto the new king, vntill they had of him obtained the liberty for the free exercise of their Religion; and combining themselues together, resolued euen with the losse of their liues and goods to maintaine the free preaching of the Word, and the exercise of their Religion, according to the Confession of Augusta; and to that end commanded all their subiects and tenants to be readie in armes, that need so requiring, euerie thirtieth man, tenth, or fifth, might be prest to come forth vnto the wars. But hauing sent a supplication vnto the king, whereunto 180 of the Nobilitie had set their hands, and receiuing no answere, but that they should desist from their purpose, and without delay to make their appearance to take the oath of their alleageance vnto the king, they forthwith the 14 of September going to Horne, by letters sent vnto the rest of the Roman Catholicke States, protested themselues to be cleare before God and the whole world of all the euils and mischiefes that were afterward to ensue, if those States not regarding the appeasing and ending of those troubles, or the safetie of them their countreymen, should take their oath of allegeance vnto the king. And so forthwith raising an army, lest vpon the sudden they should be at Horne oppressed, they began by all meanes to prouide for their affaires. But the report thereof comming vnto the States of Bohemia and Morauia, their neighbors, they were from them giuen to vnderstand, that they would become intercessors for them vnto the King, and yet not to be wanting vnto them at their need, as occasion should require

The Protestant States in Austria require to haue the free exercise of their religion granted vnto them.

The Protestant States of Austria refuse to take their oath of allegeance vnto the king vntill they might be secured of the free exercise of their religion.

Presents sent vnto the Great Sultan from King Mathias.

In the meane time letters were brought from Constantinople to Vienna, declaring King Matthias his Embassadors (hauing audience with the great Sultan) to haue in an eloquent Oration on the Kings behalfe promised religiously to keepe the peace, of late made betwixt him, the Othoman Emperour, and the Hungarians: and afterward in the Kings name to haue offered his Presents vnto the Sultan, and hee in the presence of his chiefe Bassaes to haue receiued them. But when hee came to request the gouernement of Transyluania, he would in no wise thereto consent, but gaue the same to Gabriel Bathor, with commandement vnto the Bassa of Buda for the establishing of him in this Principalitie.

Matthias sendeth vnto the Protestat states at Horne.

About the beginning of October, the Counties of Trautsame and Furtsenburg were from King Matthias sent vnto the Protestant States at Horne, and shortly after them, Maximilian the Archduke followed also: who although they with most glorious promises sought to appease them, and by all means to draw them to take the oath of their allegeance; yet could they with them no whit preuaile, without granting of them the free exercise of their religion. But the 16 of October, the Catholicke States not expecting the consent of the Protestant States, at Vienna tooke the oath of allegeance vnto Matthias the new King of Hungarie, the great ordnance in the meane time thundring off, with drums and trumpets in euery place of the city sounding, and the rest of the day being with great feasting, triumph, and solemnitie spent.

K. Mathias hauing thus at Vienna receiued the oath of allegeance of the Catholicks, shortly after departing thence, the 22 of October comming to Presburg, was there by the nobilitie of Hungary receiued and brought into the city with 10000 souldiers: which States afterwards, viz. the 6 of Nouember, offered in writing vnto the King certaine articles, whereof they desired to be by him assured: most of which articles were drawne out of the pacification made at Vienna the 23 day of August, in the yeare 1606, the chiefe effect wherof was this: That the free exercise of religion should be permitted vnto all men in all the cities and townes of Hungarie, not so much as that city excepted wherein the king should be resident: That no German Captaine should be suffered in any the strong forts of Hungarie, but that the strong townes of Rab, Comora, Viuaria, and others, should be committed vnto the gouernment of natural Hungarians borne: That the crowne of Hungarie should still be kept in Hungarie, and committed to the keeping of temporall men: That first and before all other things, a Count Palatine should be chosen: That the king himselfe should alwaies reside in Hungarie; or if not, that the Palatine should in his absence haue full power, with the counsellors of Estate of Hungarie, to determine and conclude of all things, and that the King should therewithall hold himselfe contented: That no publicke office should bee bestowed vpon any, but vpon such naturall Hungarians as had of their countrie well deserued; nor permitted vnto any for money: That no Iesuites should be suffered in the Kingdome, neither that Ecclesiasticall men should bee so much fauored as formerly they had been: That officers should not be bound to giue account of the administration of their offices, but before the Treasurers of Presburg, being naturall Hungarians borne: That from henceforth money should not be carried out of the Kingdome, as hitherto it had beene: That the Palatine being dead, the King should within a yeare chuse another, the chiefe Iustice in the meane time after the old manner supplying his roome.

Articles by the Hungarians preferred vnto King Matthias at Presburg.

King Matthias goeth to Presburg.

The Protestant States of Austria craue ayd of the Nobility and States of Hungarie.

The Protestant States of Austria and Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, then gathered together at Presburg; with request, that forasmuch as they could not by any intreaty obtain of the king the free exercise of their religion, as well within their cities as without, and that verie necessitie had driuen them by force of armes to seeke for the same, that they would by sending of them men, affoord them such aid as was vnto them due by the former pacification made at Vienna in the yeare 1606. Which troubles of Austria the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie desiring to haue appeased, sent George Turson and some others with letters of intercession in their behalfe vnto the Archduke Maximilian: which when they had deliuered vnto him, they receiued from him this answer, that king Mathias neuer thought to disturbe the common quiet of that countrie, or to attempt any thing against the priuiledges thereof, granted by the Emperor Maximilian of happy memory: but to grant vnto the cities the libertie of religion, he could by no means, partly in respect of conscience, partly for the danger that might thereof ensue from the Pope and the king of Spaine, and yet neuertheles, that he would promise to suffer and tollerat the free exercise of religion without the cities, and in the bestowing of publike offices to haue no respect of religion: yet with this this condition, that they ſhould lay downe armes, ſubmit themſelues vnto the King, acknowledge their fault, and craue pardon for the ſame; for that in ſo doing, the States ſhould haply preuaile more than by force of armes. G

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria by the Hungarians aduiſed to lay downe armes, and to ſubmit themſelues vnto the King.

With which anſwer, ſeeing no better could be got, the Hungarian Embaſſadors going vnto the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, began by diuers reaſons earneſtly to perſuade them to ſubmit themſelues vnto the King. If the Hungarians ſhould (as they ſaid) giue aid vnto them of Auſtria, they ſhould in ſo doing, in ſtead of helping them, but do them more harme; for that the Hungarian power could not be brought into Auſtria but to the vtter deſtruction thereof. That the league betwixt the Hungarians and them of Auſtria was a general league, and concerned as well the Catholiques as the Proteſtants. That the Chriſtian religion was neuer with the ſword planted or defended, Chriſt himſelfe ſaying, them to be happie which therefore H ſuffer perſecution, and commanding Peter to put vp his ſword into his ſcabberd. That it was an eaſie matter for euery man to raiſe ſtirs and tumults, but that againe to appeaſe them was a far harder matter. That by the taking vp of armes, the free exercife of Religion could not be furthered or prouided for, it being rather dangerous, leſt the contrarie part preuailing, it ſhould be vtterly ſuppreſſed. That by this meanes Hungarie it ſelfe ſhould be expoſed to many dangers, for that not only new ſtirs might vpon this occaſion by the ſubiects thereof be raiſed, but other forein Princes take vp armes againſt it alſo; the Emperour by force of armes ſeeking for his right, and the Turkiſh Sultan by a new inuaſion going about to bring the ſame vnder his ſubjection: and telling them further, the Archduke to haue promiſed to take good order for al things, ſo that they would lay downe armes: and that the clemencie and bountie of thoſe princes being knowne, they were not to doubt but that they would indeed performe what they I had in word promiſed: and that the Hungarians could not now do or attempt any thing againſt the King: but that if it ſhould happen theſe two Archdukes being dead without heires male, the gouernment of theſe two Prouinces ſhould come vnto the Archduke Ferdinand, that then they ſhould haue more cauſe to helpe them of Auſtria againſt him. Morauia they ſaid to be a free countrey, and yet the King to haue thereunto giuen no more aſſurance for the libertie of religion, more than his bare promiſe. Wherefore ſeeing that both the fortune and chance of war was doubtfull, and that war was not without the great expence of mony to be maintained; that they were of opinion, it to be beſt for the Proteſtant States of Auſtria to lay down armes, and by way of requeſt to ſolicite their cauſe with the King. K

In the meane time, the griefes which of the Hungarians complained being taken away, and all controuerſies happily ended, Illiſhaſchius was by a general conſent choſen to be Palatine, and Mathias the 14 of Nouember openly proclaimed King of Hungary; and the 19 of the ſame month in S. Martins church at Presburg in this manner crowned: Firſt, the royal Crowne was in a ſtately chariot carried out of the caſtle vnto the church, with a great number of the Counſellors and Nobilitie of Hungarie attending the ſame; in which chariot were alſo carried ten Enſignes, with the armes of the Kingdome in them trilled vp; foure of the Hungarian Counſellors taking it out of the charet in a little cheſt couered with cloath of gold, and ſo carrying of it into the Chancel of the church. After which, King Matthias, together with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, followed on horſebacke, both attyred in Hungarian apparell, and ſo L going into the Chancel, there ſtayed about halfe an houre, vntill that he was by two Biſhops brought forth vnto the Altar, before whom ten of the Hungarian nobility caried the ten aforeſaid enſignes: after whom followed the Palatine with the Crowne, Endeodius with the royall Scepter, Forgatſie with the Apple of the kingdome, Turſo with K. Stephens ſword, Tſechius carrying the Pax, as they call it; Budian the Croſſe, the Cardinal Forgatſie ſaying Maſſe, with diuers biſhops and prelats helping of him; by whom the King was at the beginning of Seruice annointed with oyle: where, while the Epiſtle and Goſpel were in reading, the Cardinal ſet the crowne vpon the Kings head, all the people crying out, Long liue Matthias the King of Hungarie. But the King with the crowne vpon his head taking a drawne ſword out of Sigefred Colloritz the Marſhals hand, thrice brandiſhed it acroſſe ouer the Clergy mens heads, and receiued M the ſacrament at the Cardinals hand. The Maſſe being ended, he by an highway couered with cloth, going in his royal robes from S. Martins church, vnto the bare-foot Friers church, as he went, cauſed mony to be caſt abroad among the people. In which church after the firſt chapter of the Goſpell of S. Iohn being read, he made 28 Knights. From thence the king with the Crowne

A crowne yet on his head, and in his ſtately robes, went out of the citie at S. Michaels gate, and there on horſebacke was brought vnto an high ſtage couered with cloath, whereon he was ſworne vnto the Hungarians as their King, and they vnto him as his ſubiects: And afterward thrice mounting vp to horſe vpon a little hill made for that purpoſe, and to downe againe, and thrice brandiſhing his ſword acroſſe, he returned backe againe into the caſtle, where hee with Maximilian the Archduke, Cardinall Forgatſie, the Popes Nuntio, and the Palatine ſat downe at one table, the reſt of the Hungarian nobility, to the number of 70, ſitting downe at ſix other tables, and ſo dining with great mirth; the Haiducks and common ſort of people beeing there bountifully feaſted alſo: where many of them, in ſcrambling for the money that was caſt abroad, and in taking vp of the cloth from the ſcaffold, hauing their hands and fingers cut off, B and ſo lamed, carried from thence the wofull remembrance of that was there then done.

The ſolemnitie of this coronation thus paſt, king Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to ſtay at Presburg, vntill that the new building in the caſtle was ended, which the nobilitie of Hungarie had appointed for the keeping of the Crowne of Hungarie, to the intent that he himſelfe might ſee the ſame, with other the royall ornaments, put thereinto, and ſealed vp with his owne ſeale: he in the mean while labouring to appeaſe diuers contentions, and to place fit men againe in the great offices of the common-weale: for that the Hungarians would by no means ſuffer the Germans to enioy any of the ſame: for which cauſe many of the chiefe officers, men of great authoritie, were diſplaced; and amongſt them, Sigifrid Colloritz alſo, a man who had moſt well deſerued of the kingdome of Hungarie: howbeit, ſhortly after he by C the counſell of Maximilian the Archduke was by the Hungarians themſelues (repenting them of that they had done) not only reſtored vnto his former offices, but had by them (and that not without his iuſt deſert) euen greater preferments offered him alſo; ſo mutable a thing the iudgment of the common people is. But Illiſhaſchius, now the Palatine of Hungarie, the 28 day of Nouember talking with the king Matthias at large, and earneſtly entreated with him in the behalfe of the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, eſpecially for that the other Proteſtant States of Hungary ſeemed now in their behalfe to be much moued alſo; and the Morauian Embaſſadors openly at the ſame time proteſting, that their ſtates could in no wiſe forſake them their friends the States of Auſtria, if their need ſo required. And albeit that both the Elector of Saxony, and other Princes of the Empire, were become earneſt interceſſours alſo vnto the king for them, D yet the Popes Nuntio ſo hardly withſtood them, as nothing could as then be granted

About the beginning of December the king returning againe from Presburg to Vienna, about the 16 of December the Proteſtant States of Auſtria at length ſent Erneſtus the baron of Landau, Maximilian Polheime, Sebaſtian Grobne, Charles Forberger, Pilgram [illegible] and Chriſtopher Buchner, their Embaſſadors vnto the king, to bring them [illegible] truſt: who the 27 of December receiued anſwer, That they ſhould [illegible] ted with ſuch anſwer as they had before receiued, and to ſubmit themſelues to [illegible] ſuſe, or els to do what they themſelues ſaw good. With which anſwer they return forthwith began to leuie new forces, and to perſuade their ſubiects, [illegible] oathes, they ſhould faithfully ſerue whitherſoeuer and [illegible]

Howbeit, they moſt ſtifly ſtill refuſed [illegible] they had before required: inſomuch, that Maximilian the Archduke little laboured in this cauſe, was quite out of hope to [illegible] any good end thereof. the skirmish holpen both for the defence of themselues and the annoying of their enemies. G Whereof the king hauing knowledge, and therewith much moued, beside the aforesaid Edict, caused another to be proclaimed at Vienna, against such souldiers as serued the Protestants; proscribing them all, and pronouncing them Rebels, except before the 21 day of Ianuary, they laying downe arme[illegible] parted out of the Protestants campe. Howbeit, the Protestant States were so far fro[illegible] mitting their forces, as that they with new supplies strengthened the same: and hauing tak[illegible] an hill not far from Hallenbynne, and from thence discharging three tire of 20 pieces of great ordnance, strucke a great feare and terror into the minds of the kings souldiers within the towne.

About this time also the States of Morauia (that nothing might on their p[illegible]bee wanting for the making of an attonement betwixt the king and the Protestant Sta[illegible] Austria) sent H some of their Embassadors vnto those States at Horn, and othersome vnto t[illegible]ing at Vienna; who hauing accesse vnto the king, declared vnto him the States of Morauia, from whom they came, to be earnestly importuned by the Protestant States of Austria, to send them aid, according to the agreement made with them the yeare before: and told him moreouer, That this manner of his proceeding tended not vnto peace and quietnesse, but rather vnto the trouble and destruction both of the kingdom and of all the other Prouinces to him belonging: all that error, the ground of those troubles (they said) to depend of a peruerse interpretation or misconstruing of words, rather than of the matter it selfe; so that it might by men desirous of peace easily be composed and ended. And that therefore [illegible] request vnto his Maiestie was, That he hauing regard not onely vnto the good and welfa[illegible] of his prouinces and subiects, but I euen of himselfe and of his honour also, would of his clem[illegible]tie and goodnesse vouchsafe to giue remedie vnto the present danger, and auert the miserable calamities now hanging ouer them, and euen readie to fall vpon their heads. The Protestant States they said to be content to put the controuersie to be decided and composed by certaine graue and wise men, to be chosen arbitrators on both parts; yet with this condition, That for the space of 14 daies no hostility should on either side be vsed: that the inhabitants both aboue and beneath Amisum should be compriſed within this truce: that such as were kept in durance for their religion, should be set at libertie: and that all high waies and passes should be from all ambushes, and other dangers cleared. Vnto which their requests the king condescending, gaue leaue vnto the States of Morauia, vpon they most equall conditions the could deuise, to compose and end all matters: K

who so laboured in this businesse betwixt the king and the Protestant States of Austria, that at length, viz. the 12 of March, a pac[illegible]ion was made betwixt the king and them his subiects; Leopold the Archduke, Melinus the P[illegible] Nuntio, the Bishop of Vienna, and other great men of the contrarie Religion and faction, [illegible]king in vaine to haue letted the same: the chiefe articles and points of which pacification were these: That the nobility in their castles & towns, as also in their houses in the cities, should for themselues and their people haue the free exercise of their Religion: That the free exercise of preaching might be vsed the in 3 Churches at Hersdore, Trihelsuincell, and Horne: That the other Churches shut vp, might againe bee opened by three of the Romish and three of the reformed Religion, and the free exercise of Religion in them vsed: That counsellors and other publicke officers should from thenceforth L indifferently be chosen of men of both Religions; but that such offices as were hereditarie should so still remaine: That the Election of Magistrates and other publicke officers in towns and cities, should from thenceforth be made by the Magistrates and citizens themselues, & not to be nominated from the Court, as hitherto they had bin: That no Church should hereafter be shut against either part, but their owne Churches to be left vnto them both, quietly to vse: That the townsmen and citizens in their townes and cities should from thenceforth haue power to make choice of their Ministers and preachers: and that for them it should be lawfull to visit the sicke, and to administer vnto them the Lords Supper: That the oath of alleageance should be taken of them of the reformed Religion, in like manner as it had bin before taken of them of the Romish, but yet not with the same ceremonies of the Romish church; all vnion & M confederation with them to be had, to be taken away: that all grudging hatred, and quarrell should be on both sides forgiuen, & for euer forgotten: Wolfgang of Hoffkirch, Voltsogius and others remoued & p[illegible]rom their offices, for not taking the oth of alegeance, being again receiued into fauor, and restored into their places: That it might be lawfull for the townes & cities aboue

A aboue Amisum, to haue the free exercise of the reformed Religion in their Suburbs and Hospitals.

The States of the Reformed Religion in Austria take the oath of obedience vnto King Matthias.

It was not long after this Pacification so made, but that King Matthias the seuenteenth of May going to Lintze with three hundred horse, was there with eight troupes of horsemen, and fifteene companies of foot, by the States sent forth to meet him, most honourably receiued, and by three triumphal Arches brought into the citie: where he receiued of the States of the Religion, the Oath of their obedience: which with much joy, triumph, and feasting performed, hee the seuen and twentieth of the same moneth againe returned to Vienna. The aforesaid States of Austria in the meane time with great zeale continuing the free exercise of their Religion at Horne; a great multitude of people dayly reforting vnto the Sermons there B made: they of the Romish Religion much grieuing and fretting thereat. The King himselfe also being come to Vienna, put diuers of the Romish Catholiques out of their Offices, and placed others of the Reformed Religion in their roomes, to the great discontentment of many.

The Turks seek secretly to encroach vpon the Christians, and the Christians seeke againe to annoy them.

About this time the Bassa of Agria, notwithstanding the peace, had for the summe of twentie thousand crownes before hand payed, secretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to haue the strong towne of Fileck in the vpper Hungarie deliuered vnto him. Which the traitor had intended (as he himselfe confessed) to haue performed, by setting of the house wherein hee himselfe dwelt, by night on fire: vnto the quenching whereof the garrison souldiers reforting, his purpose was in the meane time to haue secretly let in the Turks, and so to haue deli-C uered the towne into their hands. But this his so wicked a purpose in good time discouered, and by him confessed, he was therefore, as he had well deserued) aliue cut into foure pieces: a just reward for his foule intended treason. The Bassa of Buda also, contrarie to the treatie of peace, about the same time went about to haue exacted the Oath of allegeance of aboue foure hundred countrey villages of the Christians, being not comprised within the foresaid treatie. But as the Turkes for their part were secretly plotting how to encroach vpon the Christians, and to do them harme; so the Haiduckes on the other side in great numbers gathered together in the vpper Hungarie, began here and there to molest and trouble the Turkes, vntill they were by their Superiours commanded to desist from so doing, for disturbing of the Peace.

Illishaschius the Palatine of Hungarie dieth.

D Now about this time also, Illishaschius the Countie Palatine of Hungary died at Vienna; a man much beloued of the Hungarians his countreymen, and now by them no lesse lamented for: whose dead bodie was with great honour afterward conueyed from Vienna, vnto his owne territorie in Hungarie, and there with all funeral pompe buried with his Ancestors. In whose stead George Turson was afterward by the general consent of an hundred and fifty of the Hungarian Nobilitie chosen Countie Palatine of Hungarie, and so with the vniuersal and solemne acclamations of the people saluted.

New troubles for Religion arise in Bohemia.

And now the troubles for Religion were scarcely wel ended in Austria (as is aforesaid) but that the like, or rather worse, began forthwith, euen for the same quarrel, to arise in Bohemia; the Hussites (as they call them) most earnestly importuning the Emperor for the free exercise E of their Religion, or rather for the taking away of certaine grieuances done to their Religion: and the Romane Catholiques euen at the same time leauing nothing vnattempted, which might serue to bring them of the Religion into hatred with the Emperour, and others sitting at the helme of the gouernment of the Estate, and so to frustrate whatsoeuer the Emperour had in the general Assembly of the States, the last yeare granted vnto them of the Religion, for the free exercise and aduancement thereof. The composing of which controuersie, (tending vnto the rending in sunder of the whole Kingdome) when as the Emperor had referred vnto certaine of his chiefe Counsellours, and they altogether fauouring the Romane Catholiques, would giue them of the Religion no certaine answer whereon to rest; they therewith much discontented, as out of hope to be by them relieued, and in great feare to be by

The States of the religion appoint an Assembly of themselues to be holden in the new court at Prague.

F their Aduersaries, as enemies vnto the State, oppressed, layed their heads together, and after good deliberation taken, what were best for them to do, both for the safetie of themselues, their wiues, children, and Religion; they by a general consent, of themselues appointed the fourth of May to hold a general meeting of them of the Religion, in the new court at Prague, there these to consult of all matters concerning the businesse of Religion. And yet in the meane time openly in Parliament protesting, by the mouth of Wentceslaus Bodouitsius a Baron of Bohemia, Them to haue appointed this Assemblie for the Emperors good, and for the common quiet of the whole Realme; as also for the better informing of the Emperour of all matters: and to prouide that the Emperor and the kingdome might not through the meanes and persuasions of those euill Counsellors be brought into extreme perill and danger. Immediatly after, the States of the Religion with all speed dispatched their Embassadors vnto King Matthias, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxonie, and the Duke of Brunswicke; to request them, by their intercession to become mediators for them vnto the Emperor, for the obtaining of the free exercise of their Religion, which in all points agreed with the confession of Augusta, and which long before was exhibited vnto Maximilian the Emperour and by him allowed. Now in the meane time these the States of the Religion were by some for their proceedings commended; but by other some not onely blamed, but also accused of rebellion against the Emperour and the State. But the matter being declared vnto the Emperour, he complaining vnto himselfe of the inconsiderateness of his Counsellors; to maintaine his authoritie, caused the parliament then in hand to be prorogued; and to seeme of himselfe to grant that which he could not well withstand, commanded by a Decree, that same verie day to be appointed for the concluding of that article of Religion, on which the States themselues had before appointed their assembly to be holden in the new court at Prague. Notwithstanding which Decree, many troublesome spirits publiquely set forth other their conceits in writing, to far other purpose, grieuously therein reprehending the States of the Religion, for that of themselues they had appointed a day for their assembly into the new Court at Prague: Which (as they said) was nothing els but in a rebellious manner to rise against the Lawes of the Kingdome, and the authority of their lawfull Prince: and therefore admised them to forbeare from making any such assemblie as was by them appointed. Hereof arose great troubles euen vnder the Emperors nose, in Prague the chiefe citie of Bohemia, they of the Religion not daring to trust the Roman Catholiques, neither they them; being still ready vpon euery false report, or vaine surmise, to go together by the eares: vntill that the Emperour for the staying of these troubles, and the auoyding of further danger, was glad to cause it to be openly proclaimed in the new Court at Prague, That his Imperial Majestie hauing receiued and vnderstood the Apologie of the States, now did abrogate that his Edict published against them but a few dayes before; and now by this his new Edict did account all the States of the Religion for his faithfull and well beloued Subiects; and as of them vnto whom the right of the Kingdome, and the King his oath bound, as wel as to all other States of the kingdome. And that he also had those the same States excused, in that they for the good of his Majestie, and of the whole Kingdome, had appointed their assemblie in the new Court at Prague: and that therefore he denounced them in so doing, not in any thing to haue done any thing contrarie vnto his Majestie. And that he appointed the fiue and twentieth day of May for the general assembly of Parliament to be holden in the castle of Prague, for the ending of the Article concerning Religion, and the reforming of other the publique grieuances of the Commonweale: yet with this prouiso, That the said States should safely and quietly come vnto the said Parliament, without entertaining of any forreine souldiers; as that his Majesty should also, not by himselfe nor any other, for pay entertaine any, or suffer any forreine souldiers to come into the Kingdome. Which the Emperors Edict being proclaimed, the States of the Religion hauing made their publique prayers, and sung certain Hymnes and Psalmes vnto the glory of God, for the good successe of their businesse, left the new court at Prague, and returned euery man home to their owne houses, to make themselues readie to come vnto the Parliament to be holden at the appointed day.

The Emperor maketh faire weather with the States of the Religion in Bohemia.

The States of Bohemia by writing declare vnto the Emperor their purpose for the defence of their Religion.

But the day appointed for the Parliament being come, and the Emperour still delaying the matter, the States of the Religion wearie of such long delayes, and in doubt to bee therewith deluded, as hauing not receiued from the Emperour any such answer as whereon to rest, the third of Iune offered vnto the Emperour a short writing, concerning their griefe and further purpose, to this effect. They had (as they said) expected, and well hoped, that regard being had not onely of so many requests of so great and most noble Princes, made in their

A their behalfe; but euen of the Emperour his promise also, made vnto them, both in the generall assembly of the States the last yeare, and in the late precept of the Emperours also, they should at length haue receiued such answer vnto their petition, concerning the free exercise of their Religion, as whereon they might haue safely rested. Which for that it had not beene yet done, they referred the doing thereof vnto God and future time; imputing the blame thereof not vnto his Imperiall Majestie, but vnto the vnquiet and troublesome natures of some as well the Ecclesiasticall as Temporall magistrates and persons. But forasmuch as they meant not longer to be deluded by their enemies, and much lesse to be defrauded of his Majesties royall promise, which was now vnto the World knowne, they had thought good to offer and present vnto his Maiestie a writing conceiued in the Bohemian tongue: according
B vnto which they desired to be secured, concerning the free exercise of their Religion; most humbly requesting his Maiestie to accept of the same, and at length to satisfie their requests. Which if it might not be granted (the Emperour his Maiestie hauing more respect vnto the troublesome Clergie men, and some other his euill affected counsellors, than to the faithfull States and subiects of his Kingdome) that then they would rest themselues vpon the Decree made in the assembly holden in the yeare 1608, and vpon the last edict of his Maiestie: yet with this solemne protestation, That seeing they had by certain information vnderstood, much warlike preparation (but especially in Bauaria) to be made, and diuers consultations in many places to be holden against the States of the Religion (his Imperiall Maiestie and the other his faithfull Counsellours, thereof not knowing) which might tend vnto the ruine and de-C struction both of his Maiestie and of the whole Kingdome: they themselues would take vpon them the defence thereof, and to doe their endeauour, that furnished with men and armes, they might to the vttermost of their power defend him their Soueraigne, together with themselues, and the whole Kingdome, against the force and inuasion of their foreine enemies.

Embassadours from the Duke of Saxonie in the behalfe of the States.

In the meane time while these things were thus in doing, an Embassadour came from the Duke of Saxonie to Prague, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the granting of them the free exercise of their Religion: the Embassadours of the States of Silesia forthwith following of them also; who in like manner requesting also of the Emperour, to haue the liberty for the free exercise of their Religion by him confirmed vnto them; promised their

The States of Bohemia raise their forces.

D most readie help and aid vnto the States of Bohemia, if need should so require. But the States of Bohemia hauing from day to day in vaine expected answer from the Emperour, turning themselues vnto their former resolution for the defence of themselues and of their Religion; forthwith raised a great number both of horse and foot, whome with their well knowne captaines and Commanders they brought euen vnto the citie of Prague. Howbeit at length, viz. the eleuenth of Iuly, the Saxon Embassadors earnestly soliciting their cause, and vrging their request, they according to their desire receiued answer from the Emperour, by letters from his Maiestie written to this effect.

The Emperors letters vnto the States of the religion in Bohemia, for the free exercise of their Religion.

Hee gaue all men (as hee said) to vnderstand, and by these his letters witnessed to eternall memorie, That after that all the free States of his Kingdome of Bohemia, which, in the re-
E ceiuing of the Lords Supper, participate the bodie and bloud of our Lord Christ Iesus vnder both kindes, his faithfull subiects, had in the assemblie holden in the castle at Prague in the yeare 1608; in all humilitie requested, That it might be lawfull for them to hold, and freely to exercise their Religion, according to the Confession of Augusta (as some call it) exhibited vnto his father Maximilian the Emperour of most happie memorie, and by him vnto the said States allowed: and that he then and at that time, by reason of other most weightie businesse, for which that assemblie was then called, and such as could suffer no procrastination or delay, had thought it good to deferre the allowing and ratifying of this their petition, vnto this present assemblie of Parliament: and that the same States now againe assembled, incessantly renewing this their former petition, and hauing thereunto joyned also the request and F intercession of certaine noble personages, had requested to be therein satisfied: and that hee with his Counsellours would consult how prouision might bee made for his subiects in the Kingdome of Bohemia, as well communicating vnder both kindes, as vnder one; now at length to haue effected the same. Wherefore seeing that his will and desire was, that both in

in these and future times peace and quietnesse might for the increasing of the Kingdome be preserued and kept amongst his subiects of all the three estates of the Kingdome of Bohemia, communicating as well vnder the one, as vnder both kindes: that both parties might freely and without any impediment or let, haue the free exercise of their Religon, whereby they were [illegible] in hope to obtaine euerlasting saluation. And to the intent that accomplishmen[illegible]tisfaction might in all poynts bee made, as well according vnto the breaking vp of the assemblie of Parliament in the yeare 1608, as to the performance of his owne precept, of late published (whereby hee hath acknowledged, and euen yet acknowledgeth, those same Estates communicating vnder both kindes, and subscribing to this confession, for his faithfull and loyall subiects, vnto whom the rights and immunities of the Kingdome of Bohemia belonged) hee by the common consent of the Councellours, and other Magistrates of the Kingdome did determine, That his subiects communicating both vn[illegible]one and both kindes, should friendly and peaceably liue together, without wronging or reuiling of one another; and that vpon the payne and penaltie in the Law set downe, to be inflicted vpon them that should otherwise doe. And moreouer, seeing that they which communicated but vnder one kinde, enioyed the free exercise of their Religion in all poynts throughout the Kingdome of Bohemia, that hee gaue leaue and commaunded, that they also which communicated vnder both kindes, viz. all the States of the Religion, with all such as embraced the Confession of Bohemia, sometime exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour his father, in the [illegible]liament holden in the yeare 1575, and now againe to himselfe presented, should e[illegible]e where and in all places of the Kingdome, haue the free exercise of their Religion, without the let or interruption of any; to retaine the same, vntill a generall vnion of Religion, and an ending of all dissention and controuersies might bee made. Moreouer, That hee did grant vnto the States of the Religion this fauour, That they should haue the lower Consistorie at Prague, with power to conforme the same according to their owne Confession. That they might lawfully make their Priestes, as well in the Bohemian as Germane Tongue, and set them ouer their Churches, without any let of the Archbishop of Prague. That hee did also restore vnto them the Vniuersitie of Prague, which for many yeares agoe belonged vnto the States of the Religion vnder both kindes: giuing them power againe to open the same, to furnish it with graue and learned men of their owne Confession, to beautifie it with good Lawes, and to appoint certaine of [illegible]ir owne companie and profession for Gouernours and defendors as well of the Con[illegible]ion as of the Vniuersitie: whome so by the States appointed and chosen, hee without any [illegible]tay or delay, or other instruction or information than they should from the States receiue, would confirme in that their office, and pronounce them for the lawfull Defendours: yet so, as that if hee beeing letted by other greater businesse, cannot performe the same within the space of foureteene dayes, they shall neuertheless continue Defendours, and as well enioy the charge of the office committed vnto them, as if they had beene therein by him confirmed: and that one or other of their number beeing dead, it shall bee lawfull for the States to chuse other in their places. And if that beside the Churches which they now hold, they would build other moe, or erect moe schooles for the instructing of the youth, it shall bee lawfull for them freely and without any let so to doe, as well in the Cities as in the Countrey Townes and villages. And forasmuch as in some of the Cities of the Kingdome of Bohemia, men of both religions dwelt together, hee therefore did will and commaund, That for the preseruation of peace and quietnesse, either part freely exercising their religion, and obeying their Priests, should by no meanes either hurt or trouble them on the other part; and much lesse to hinder them to burie their dead in their Churches or Church-yards, with the ringing or tolling of the Bels, or goe about to turne any man from his Religion, of what state or condition so euer he bee, whether hee dwell in the Citie or in the Countrey towne or village; or by force to draw them to their opinion, or to take their part. For that he onely respected, that peace and quietnesse might be kept, and that mutuall loue might still grow amongst all the three States: Vnto which end and purpose, that hee for himselfe and his heires, and the Kings of Bohemia his Successo[illegible], in the Faith and word of a King, did graunt and promise vnto the States

A States of the Religion, vnto whom this common peace of Religion (as they call it) belongeth; as to a principal member of the Empire, all these things to be for euer inuiolably kept (the Ecclesiastical and temporal persons whosoeuer in vaine resisting) so that no contrarie precept or Edict, should either by himselfe, or any other his heires or successors be published against the States of the Religion; or being published by any, should be accounted effectual and strong: especially seeing that he by these his letters, pronounceth all the Edicts hitherto published against these the States of the Religion, to be voyd, frustrate, and of none effect. Neither would that any thing of those which were done by the States of the Religion whilest they sought for the confirmation of this Article concerning Religion, should for euer be layed to their charge, or by any man by way of reproch objected vnto them. And that
B therefore he straightly charged and commanded all Magistrates, and such as bare rule in Bohemia, to the vttermost of their power to protect and defend all the three States, together with them of the Religion; and neither themselues to trouble them, nor suffer them to be by any others for the exercise of their Religion molested or troubled: For that he and other the Kings of Bohemia his Successours, would most seuerely chastise all such as should offend against these his Majesties letters (which to be for euer remembred, he would cause the same to be enrolled in the publique Records of Parliament) whether such offendors were Ecclesiasticall or Temporall men, to bee sharpely punished as the troublers of the Common Peace.

This was the summe of his Majesties Letters, which he caused to be publiquely set vp in C the Castle of Prague the thirteenth of Iuly, that it might be to all men knowne, this Article of Religion, which was the first of the Articles in this Parliament propounded, to be concluded and agreed vpon according to the minde of the States of the Religion, and so their requests to be in all points satisfied. Who forthwith thereupon, the fifteenth day of Iuly caused the first publique Sermon according to the confession of Augusta, to be preached in the German tongue in a Church of them of the Religion, which had for a long time before beene shut vp. At which time they also sent vnto the Elector of Saxonie, to send vnto them certaine learned men, for the setting vp of the Vniuersitie, and the gouerning of the Consistorie at Prague. And yet for all this, the Embassadors for the States of Silesia still earnestly labo-
D ring with the Emperor for the libertie of Religion to be granted to the said States and the rest of the inhabitants of the Prouince; the States of Bohemia refused in any wise to dismisse their souldiers whom they had mustered neere vnto Roggenson, vntill the Silesians were of their request in that point satisfied: offering also vnto the Emperor a large libell of the grieues of them the said States.

Now it may be that some hauing read so much as is before written concerning these late troubles about the free exercise of the reformed Religion, but especially in Bohemia, Austria, Morauia, and Silesia, may deeme the same both tedious and beside our purpose: vnto whom indeed it is not written; but rather vnto such as who together with my selfe (the wars betwixt the Christians and the Turks ended, & the peace concluded as is aforesaid) desire yet to know in what state those frontier Countries stand; which being the greatest Bulwarkes of E that side of Christendome, and the chiefe Territories of the House of Austria, are (the peace being either expired, or otherwise broken off) most subiect vnto the furie of the puissant enemie, as neerest vnto him, and so like soonest to feele of his great force and power, prefining vnto it selfe neither bounds nor measure, so long as there is any thing farther. Against whom the Christian Emperour had no other Forces of his owne to oppose, more than such as hee could raise out of the reliques of Hungarie, and the aforesaid frontier Countries. All together but weake helpes against so puissant an Enemie, as neuer commeth into the field but with a world of men following of him: but yet much weaker, being (as now of late they were) euerie one of them apart diuided in themselues about matters of Religion, the incurable maladie
F of the Christian Estates and Commonweales; the heauie and lamentable effect whereof too much of late appeared in the losse of Strigonium, won by the Turks with a far lesse army than euer the Grand Seigniors Lieutenant General was woont to come into Hungarie withall: and yet the Christian Emperour by reason of the reuolt of the Hungarians (vpon a discontment about the exercise of their Religion) not able of himselfe to relieue the distressed citie of

Stri-

Strigonium, or yet to put an armie of any ſtrength into the field, for the defence of the reſt of his cities or territories. So weake are euen the greateſt Princes, their ſubiects being among themſelues in mindes diuided.

The Turkes Embaſſadour commeth to Vienna, and from thence to Prage

But not to ſtray farther, the Turks Embaſſador in the meane time with a notable traine of an hundred and [illegible] Turks comming from Vienna the one and twentieth of September, and there hauing [illegible], and with great gifts preſented the King, ſet forward toward Prague, where he was by the Citiſens and certaine Noblemen of the Emperours Councell the 12 of October honourably receiued; and the 19 of the ſame moneth admitted vnto the Emperors preſence, firſt preſented vnto him from the Great Sultan his Maſter, a rich Tent of diuers colours, moſt curiouſly wrought with faire Orient Pearle of great value; and three foure couragious horſes, all furniſhed with moſt rich and ſumptuous furniture. He preſented vnto him alſo certaine Turkiſh weapons ſet and garniſhed with pretious ſtones, and a Princely Turks robe ſuch as they vſe at their marriages, gliſtering with gold and pretious ſtones, with diuers other rare things of leſſe value: together with which he deliuered vnto him the Great Sultans Letters; and withall deſired the confirmation of the Peace before made for twentie yeares, to be now againe renewed. Vnto which Embaſſadour Letters were afterward deliuered from the Emperor, together with certaine other rich Preſents to be by him preſented vnto the Great Sultan: viz. certaine Caroches lined within with Damaske, and couered without with blacke Veluet; ſix faire and gallant horſes moſt richly furniſhed; a Clocke of wonderfull workmanſhip; two faire Desks to write vpon of Ebo[illegible]; with diuers other like Preſents of no ſmall price. Who ſo charged with Preſents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking anſwered, was afterward in the beginning of Ianuarie with a traine of 200 horſe from Prague honourably diſmiſſed.

A Here followeth a Continuation of this preſent Hiſtorie (containing thoſe occurrents which haue happened to the Turkiſh Empire ſince the yeare of our Lord, 1609, vnto the yeare, 1617, &c.)

By EDWARD GRIMSTON, Sargeant at Armes.

THe Turkiſh Emperour, hauing beene freed ſome yeares from the care of warres in Hangarie, in regard that hee had concluded a truce for twentie yeares with the Emperour Rodulphus, he now bent all his forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Sophie of Perſia, where hee had no good ſucceſſe this yeare. For the Perſians hauing formerly extended their monarchie farre into the Turkiſh Empire, and defeated Cicala Baſſa and others in diuers battels; now they entered into the Prouince of Babylon, with a deſigne to joyne it to Perſia. Achmat to ſtay the courſe of their proſperitie, ſends a mightie armie thither, vnder the command of Naſſut Baſſa: but his fortune was no better than thoſe that went before him. The Perſians came to meet him, gaue him battell, defeated him, and ſlew 20000 of his men. Theſe mournfull newes comming to Court, did much diſtemper the Sultans minde; he could not endure it ſhould be ſaid, that the Perſian had defeated his mighty armies thrice in open battel; and much leſſe that it ſhould be ſo, and that hee ſhould ſeiſe vpon his countries: wherefore to repaire this loſſe, hee leuies new forces to be commanded by Gambolat Baſſa of Aleppo, who had beene the moſt powerful Rebell in Aſia, and was newly reconciled and brought into fauour with the graund Seignior. This man came to the Port to receiue the Sultans commandements, and to paſſe his armie into Aſia: but whether hauing ſome ſuſpition, that hee had intelligence with the Perſians, or that ſuch as enuied his greatneſſe, had giuen ſome bad impreſſion of his loyaltie to the Sultan; within ſome few daies after his arriuall, Achmat cauſed him to be ſlaine by his Capigi. Whereby wee may well obſerue, that hee that is a Rebell to his Prince, which hath ſo violently oppreſt his ſubiects, and ſet his countries on fire by ſedition, the which he hath been forced to quench with the bloud of innocents, cannot but end his daies violently and miſerably, ſeeing that God reuengeth the bloud of innocents vpon the guiltie.

The Perſian ſeeing what aduantage hee had gotten of the Turke, laboured by the bruit of his victories, to draw the Chriſtian Princes vnto his partie, and with them wholly to ruine the Othomans; the which he had ſo happily begun For the effecting whereof, he ſent his Embaſſadors to the Emperor being at Prague, to perſuade him to breake the peace with the Turke, and to joyne with him. The Embaſſadors arriued at Prague this yeare with rich and rare Preſents: firſt a croſſe of gold inricht with many precious ſtones; amongſt which there was one piece of amber, whereon was ſeene the figure of the Virgin Marie, holding her young Babe in her armes; the which was ſo artificially grauen, as it might be thought the worke of nature: a Topas of exceeding greatneſſe, giuen to the king of Perſia by an Indian king: two kniues of [illegible]maske, with hafts of jaſper, and their ſheaths couered with diamonds: a certaine kind of Indian wood of moſt excellent vertue, moſt ſoueraigne to cure the paines of the breſt, and to purge the ſtomacke: the gall of a pellican excellent to cure the pleuriſie, appoplexie, and feuer: two topazes the one white, and the other violet; this laſt was ſo big, as it was capable to make a cup: an Amathiſt as big as a hens egge; a Perſian bow inlaid with the veines of a cammell, and a rough diamond exceeding great; a white ſtone of the colour of water, which was a preſeruatiue againſt plague, beeing hung about ones necke; three orientall pearles exceeding big; three rich eſcarbuncles, and three marueilous faire diamonds; and withall this a ſerpents horne, much eſteemed for the rare vertues. All theſe Preſents were very wel accepted, and the embaſſadors much honored. But what apparance was there for the Emperor, who had ſo great differences with his brother Matthias king of Hungarie, who ſaw the greateſt part of his ſubiects rebelled againſt him, his Prouinces in diuiſion, Tranſyluania in combuſtion by the conſpiracie which had bin diſcouered againſt Battori, and finally a generall diſorder ouer all, to breake the peace with the Turk, (who was at his dore, retained only with this bar) and to allie himſelfe with the Perſian ſo far from his countries, from whom he could draw no ſuccors, but onely

and at his returne from Hierusalem and Palestina, went to receiue in Heauen the glorious palmes of his holy actions. The gallies of Biserta had beene accustomed to fetch prunes there in that season (which was in the Spring time) whom the gallies of Malta had a designe to surprise. But the contrarie winds, and the tempestuous seas ouerthrew that enterprise, yet their voyage was not altogether vnprofitable; for returning towards Malta, beeing within the channell, which diuides the Island from that of Sicilie, they encountered with a great gallion of Tunes, armed by a Turke called Carousinan, beeing in view of the gallies of Malta: The Rayse (who commanded) assured his companie, and (smiling) promised to free them from their enemies. Being so transported with vanitie, as he spake confidently, that he would not feare twentie of the gallies of Malta: but this his pride was soone abated with his ruine; for the fiue gallies came close vnder him, and plied him so furiously with their cannon, as they sunke him. The gallie wherein Verdelli an Italian Knight commanded, had like to haue been lost, for beeing grapled with the gallion, if the diligence of Verdelli had not speedily retired it. The Turks after the losse of their vessell, began to swim away, but they were all made slaues to serue in the gallies of Malta, who this yeare had no other fruits of their generous enterprises.

The gallies of Malta sent to surprise them of Biserta.

They sinke a gallion of Tunes.

The gallies of Cosmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuskanie, parted from Ligorne, vnder the conduct of the Commander, and Admirall Inghirami, and running alongst the coast of Barbarie, they tooke a Turkish ship in the sight of Algier, loaden with merchandise, armes, and munition of warre, freeing many Christian slaues which were in it. This happie beginning promised them better fortune. They passe on, and sometwentie fiue leagues beyond Algiers they goe to surprise the towne of Bisquerre, a small towne in circuit, but strong and well walled. Inghirami drawing neere vnto the coast, tooke downe his masts, lest they should discouer his comming. In the meane time he sent two long boats to finde some place fit for their landing; the which being carefully obserued, Colonell Bindy landed his men, and about eleuen a clocke at night marched in good order towards the towne, and forced it. The darkenesse of the night kept them from spoyling it; beeing content onely to set their guards and Sentinels in the most important places of the wall: but day beeing come, the souldiers made themselues maisters of the towne, which they sacked and spoyled. Certaine Moores and Turkes, during the obscuritie of the night, had retired themselues into a Mosque which they fortified: They were summoned to yeeld; but the feare of beeing slaues, (which they could not auoid) made them resolue to die in their owne defence; so as the Florentines hauing forced the place, put them all to the sword; and then embarqued their troupes, hauing filled Bisquerre with fire and bloud. The night following, beeing in the Gulph called the Bad woman, they met with a pinnace loaden with corne, the which they tooke, and sent to Ligorne, and then they past on to encrease their conqueste. Beeing vpon the coast of Sardinia, two Galliots of Biserta did furnish them with a faire occasion. Inghirami sendeth his gallies to pursue them, who hauing had them in chase three-score leagues, tooke the one, wherein they had one hundred and twentie slaues, and freed many poore Christians from the chaine, who suffered the tyrannie of the Turkish seruitude. They also tooke a Turkish Gallie within halfe a league of Algier, and spoyled it. And thus triumphing ouer their enemies, they tooke their course towards Ligorne, hauing taken foure Turkish vessels, spoyled the towne of Bisquerre, and twice braued that of Algier.

This yeare was fatall for the Morisques or new Christians in Spaine, who being in number nine hundred thousand persons, as the originall writes, and had continued there from father to sonne, for the space of almost nine hundred yeares, were now in an instant banished, and made vagabonds with the blast of the Kings mouth: Men discoursed diuersly heereof. Some said, that the King had reason to do it, for that they had secret practises and intelligence with the Turke his capitall enemie. Others affirmed, that he did wisely to preuent their attempts against his Estate, which were to bee feared considering their numbers were so great. And some said plainely, that it was to haue their lands and inheritances, which had continued so long in their races. But the King declared his owne intent by his Edict, the which he published in these termes.

The Morisques or new Christians chased out of Spaine.

The King of Spaine: Edict.

The King: For that a Realme doth in conscience binde a good and Christian gouernment, to C expell out of all Realmes and Common-weales those things which breed scandall, and bring hurt to our good subiects, & danger to the Estate, but especially which are offensiue to God, and preiudiciall to his seruice: for this cause experience hauing taught vs, That the residence of the new Christian Morisques, and their abode in the Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andelosia, hath beene the cause of all these inconueniences: For that besides the manner of their proceeding, which ioyned in the rebellion of Granado, the which began by cruell murthers of all the Priests and old Christians which liued amongst them, calling the Turke in to their aid; yet hauing drawne them out of the said Countrey, and suffered them to liue in our other Prouinces, so as they would repent them of their faults, and liue faithfully and Christian like, according to the precepts and iust ordinances which H were giuen them: They haue not obserued and kept them according to the strict and direct rules of our Holy Faith: but haue alwayes made shew to contemne it, and to haue no feare to offend God; as hath beene seene by the great numbers which haue beene punished by the Inquisition: and besides, they haue committed many thefts and murthers against the old Christians. And not content herewith, they haue conspired against my Royall Crowne and Realmes, seeking aid and succours from the Turke, certaine interposed persons beeing sent to that effect, and doing the like with other Princes, promising vnto themselues ayde and assistance, offering vnto them their persons and goods. And seeing that during so many yeares, in which they haue practised these treasons and conspiracies, not any one hath come to reueale them, but they haue alwayes couered, concealed, and I denied them; it is a most apparant signe, that they haue all beene of one minde and will, against the seruice of God and of mee, and against the good of this Realme; yet they might haue imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who haue done seruice to God, to the Kings our progenitours, and to vs, like good Christians, and most loyall vassals.

Wherefore considering all this, and how much I am bound to set downe some good order, and to procure the preseruation and increase of my Realmes and subiects, and desiring to prouide for all; I haue decreed, with the aduice and counsell of many iudicious learned men, and others, that are verie religious, wise, and jealous of Gods seruice and mine, to chase out of the sayd Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andelosia, and out of the Towne of Hernache (although these not within the limits of the said Realmes) all the new Christians Morisques, both men, women, and children. For when as a great or detestable crime is committed in any College or Communaltie, it is fit that Colledge or Communaltie should be ruined, and that the lesse for the greater, and one with another, should bee punished: And that such as peruert the good and sincere life of Common-weales, and of their Townes and Cities, should be banished from other inhabitants, lest their contagion infect them.

For this cause, by vertue of these presents, wee ordaine and commaund, That all the new Christians Morisques, without any exception of age or sexe, of those that liue and reside in the said Realmes, and in the Towne of Hernache, except such as be slaues, shall L within the space of thirtie dayes after the publication heereof, depart out of all our Realmes, and Dominions of Spaine, with their wiues, children, seruants, and others of their Nation: and that they shall not presume to returne nor to make any residence in them, in any sort whatsoeuer. And wee forbid them to depart by the realmes of Valencia, or Aragon, nor to enter into them, nor to stay in any of our Realmes or Countries after the time prefixed, vpon paine of death, and confiscation of all their goods. And wee commaund, that no person within our realmes and Seigniories, of what estate, qualities, or condition soeuer, shall presume to receiue, conceale, or defend publiquely nor secretly any Morisque man or woman, after the said tearme, vpon paine to lose all their goods, vassals, forts, and lands; and moreouer to lose all the graces, and benefits which they haue from mee, to be applied to my Exchequer.

And though I may iustly confiscate all the goods moueable and vnmoueable of the said Morisques, as belonging to traitours, and guiltie of high treason; yet vsing clemencie, I am content

A content, that during the said terme of thirtie daies, they may dispose of their moueable goods, and carrie them away, not in gold, siluer, iewels, nor letters of exchange, but in merchandise, which is not prohibited, bought of the naturall subiects of this realme, and not of others: or in the commodities of the said countrey. And to the end they may during the time of thirtie dayes dispose thereof, and of their mooueable goods, and employ it in merchandise, or in the commodities of the countrey, and transport what they shall buy (for as for their lands, that must be annexed to my reuenues, to be employed in the seruice of God and the common weale, as I shall thinke most fit) I declare by these Presents, that I take them into my royall protection, and assure them and their goods, That during the said time they may goe and come, to sell, exchange, and alienate all their mooueable goods, and to employ their mo- ney, gold, siluer, and jewels, in merchandise not prohibited, or in the commodities of the Countrey, and to transport the same freely, without any let or interruption, by land or by sea, paying vsuall customes; so as they carrie no gold or siluer coyned, or to coyne, nor any other thing prohibited by the lawes of my realme. Yet we are content, they shall carrie so much money as shall be needfull for their passage by land, and embarking by sea: commanding all our officers and louing subiects to see this present Edict duely obserued, &c. Signed, I the King.

After the publication of this Edict, the tearme of thirtie dayes was restrained to twentie, so as the Morisques were hastened to depart: and the ships and vessels of what countrey soeuer, were stayed in all the ports of Spaine, to transport them whither they would goe. Ma- C ny passed from Spaine into Barbarie: but during this yeare there came aboue 150000 of these Morisques into France; the King sending Commissaries, to see them well vsed, and orderly transported away.

There was a warre fallen out in Barbarie betwixt Muley Xequy, King of Fez, and Muley Sidan his younger brother, both Mahometanes; in which warre the younger forced the elder to flie his Countrey, and to come and craue ayd from Philip King of Spaine: But the vnfortunate losse of Don Sebastian King of Portugall, was a good president for the Spaniard not to trust in barbarous Kings, without good assurance: Hee treated with the Barbarian, and promised him succours, with an hundred thousand Duckats to re- turne to Alarache, (a place which held for him) where by money or other practises, D hee should draw vnto him as many souldiers as hee could: And that for the safetie of the succours that hee should giue him, hee should put Alarache or Arrache into his handes. This Arrache is a strong Towne in the Realme of Fez, in the Prouince of Algar, seated vpon the Ocean, at the mouth of the Riuer of Lucus, whereon part of it is built, and the other part vpon the Ocean: It hath a goodly Port, and hard to take for that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the Kings of Fez doe vsually entertaine a garrison of three hundred light horse, and three hundred harquebusiers: for that the Portugalls and Castilians, hold in a manner all the Sea Townes of the Prouinces of Habat, and Etif, where they haue great Garrisons. This Prouince is from the Riuer of Nocor along the Mediterranean Sea, vnto the straight of Gibralter, the other is vpon E the Ocean from the said straight vnto the riuer Lucus, in the which the King of Spaine holdeth at this day the strong Townes of Tanger, Arzilla, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to Arrache, with his money in one of the King of Spaine his ships; to whome in a short time repayred many of his friends and seruants. The Spaniard in the meane time hauing prepared a fleet of a great number of gallies and ships, and embarqued ten thousand souldiers therein, he gaue the command thereof vnto the Marquesse of Saint Germaine, who arriued on the twentieth of Nouember in the euening at the Port of Arrache, and there rode at anchor all the night. The next day in the mornining, the Marquesse calling all the Captaines to a Counsell, impar- ting vnto them his designe for to force Arrache, in case that the Mooriſh King did not F keepe his promise; they gaue him assurance, that they would carrie themselues like vn- to braue and valiant souldiers. But see what happened: The King of Fez hauing no meanes to goe from his word, seeing the Spaniard so strong as hee might well force it, many of his followers and people, fearing to fall vnder the power of Spaine, they would haue abandoned him: but hauing the Gouernour of the castle of his deuotion, hee thrust out the

...ing that the Spaniards were entered into the castle, all the inhabitants ran to armes, and thinking to relish themselues that many of them had ended their daies valiantly, during 3 houres combat, they were forced to yeeld vnto the Marquesse, who presently planted the crosse and armes of Castile ... all the Towers and Steeples. Thus this strong towne which the Castilians Portugals ... so long desired, and whereas the inhabitants receiued a great ruine, ... the end fall ... vnder the domination of their king. The news of this exploit being brought into Spaine, pleased the King much, and the people made bone-fires for joy: these are the alterations of times. The Moores in old time were woont to ouerrun Spaine, and now the Spaniards take their pleasures in Mauritania.

About the end of this yeare newes came to Constantinople, of the great warre ... had been between the Vncle and the Nephew, by the death of the great Cham of ... ars: the sonne, who during his fathers life time, had continued at Constantinople as an hostage, and was now sent backe into his countrie by the Sultan Achmat, thinking to enioy his fathers estate; his vncle, brother to the deceased Cham, practised to seize vpon the crowne: but either of them hauing drawne an armie of 60000 men together, in the end, they ioyned battell, whereas after the slaughter of 40000 men vpon the place, the sonne had the victorie, and by that meanes obtained the Crowne of Tartaria.

I will conclude this yeare 1610, with the relation of a particular businesse, to shew the greedie desire of the Turkes to get by any vniust meanes whatsoeuer, and their infidelitie and I falshood to say and sweare any thing for bribes. Some yeares ... e, one Master Willoughbie an English Gentleman, hauing rigged vp a ship for war into the Leuant, hee came into Algier in Barbarie to sell his prize, where at that time one Solyman Catania was Bassa. This ship was suddenly seised on, and rifled by the command of this Bassa, vpon no other subiect, but that the Bassa pretended this ship had burnt a Caramousall of his, which in truth the Bassa himselfe had caused to be set on fire, that vnder colour thereof he might seise vpon the ship and goods. Master Willoughbie went to Constantinople, and there made his complaint to Sir Henrie Lillie, then Embassadour for the English; but yet could get no satisfaction: whereupon he returned into England, and obtained letters from his Majestie to the Grand Seignior, and to Sir Thomas Glouer, then Embassador, residing at Constantinople; which hauing receiued, he went presently to the Chimacham (who was Lieutenant to Murath Bassa the grand Visier, hee beeing then K imployed in the warres against the Persian). The Chimacham hauing read these letters, would not suffer them to be deliuered to the ... Seignior; promising to doe justice vpon Solyman Catania, whom he discharged from his place, and sent for him to Constantinople; who beeing come, and called in question, he denied the fact: Master Willoughbie (hauing no certaine proofe of his losse) suborned one Ofish Bassa a Turke, who had beene at Mecha, and was therefore held a verie holy man, who set a brother of his to procure false witnesses, vpon promise to haue the tenth part of what should be recouered: The witnesses being readie to sweare to his assertion, Solyman Catania hearing their Oath, compounded with Master Willoughbie, and gaue him foure or fiue thousand Dollars; so the businesse ended. Which shewes the corruption of the Turks, and that the holiest of them for mony will not sticke to beare false witnesse, L and take false Oathes.

A great plague in Constantinople.

This yeare 1611 the citie of Constantinople was wonderfully afflicted with the Plague, the which dispersed it selfe ouer all, and crept into the Grand Seigniours Seraglio, whereas one of his sonnes died of that infection: whereupon the Grand Seigniour was forced to retire for his safetie, and to passe the remainder of the Summer in his pallace or Seraglio of Darut Bassa, about a league and a halfe distant from the citie, this violent contagion did so rage in Constantinople for the space of fiue moneths, as there were numbred two hundred thousand persons dead within the time, and they did commonly carrie euerie day twelue or fifteene hundred bodies to be buried. The greatnesse of this mortalitie is not to be imputed so much to the corruption of the aire, as to the wilfull negligence of the Turks, who would not vouchsafe to turne away from a bodie dead of this disease, when it goes to buriall, nor to forbeare to visite their friends beeing infected. The obstinate beliefe they haue of Predestination maketh them brutishly contemne all sorts of dangers: For say they, as soone as man comes out of his mothers wombe to enioy the light of the world, God writes in his forehead al the good 200000 persons dead of the plague.

The Turkes obstinate beliefe touching predestination.

A or euill shall happen vnto him, and particularly of what death he shall die, the necessity whereof no humane power can auoid. All is gouerned (say they) by Destinie, and therefore they regard not any infection, but contrariwise when any one is dead, another takes his cloathes and weares them: which is the cause that Constantinople and the grand Caire are seldome free; and when as the aire is any thing disposed to contagion, there dies such multitudes of people, as they do not number them but by hundred thousands.

Before the beginning of this plague, the Baron of Salignac Embassadour for the French King at Constantinople, ended his embassage with his life. His most Christian Majestie sent the Baron of Mole, eldest sonne to the Baron of Sansie, to supplie his place. Hee arriued at Pera this yeare in the beginning of September, and about the end of October the Sul-
B tan being returned to Constantinople; after that hee had visited the Muphti, (who is the chiefe of their Law) the Graund Visier, the Defterda, (who is the Sultans high Treasurer) the Bostangi Bassa his chiefe Gardiner, with other Great men of the Port which were highly in fauour; in the end he was admitted to audience, and to kisse the Sultans hand. A ceremonie which in mine opinion I owe vnto the Historie, to shew that the Majestie of the Turkish Emperours is so great, as to approch neere vnto them, the Embassadours of forreine Princes are forced to disguise themselues, and leauing the habits of their nation, to attyre themselues and their Traine after the Turkish manner. Thus the Embassadour of France parted from his Lodging at Pera, wearing vpon his French apparell a long Turkish Robe of cloath of gold curled, furred with Sables: his Gentlemen and Secretaries to the number of sixteene had the

C like Robes, but of meaner stuffe, wearing caps of blacke Veluet: hee had twentie Seruants in long cassockes of skarlet, called in Turkish, Ferrages, and vpon them long Robes of the same stuffe, with caps of Taffata; the foure Dragomans or the Kings Interpreters, the Captaines, Masters of Ships, and other Frenchmen attyred all in long Robes, accompanied the Traine. Hee past the channell which doth separate Pera from Constantinople: being come to the other side, he found many goodly horses for him and his Traine, which some Turkes that were friends to France, had sent him to conduct him to the Citie; at the gate whereof many Chiaus and Ianizaries attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio: two Chiaus Bassa's went of either side him, accompanying him thither, the rest of the Turks going before. His arriual was no lesse honorable ... the Palace Royal, than his comming to the towne: Two Capigi
D Bassa's, or chiefe of the Porters, receiued him at the entrie of a great Court, and conducted him to the Graund Visier, who attended him at dinner in the hall, where he was feasted, being accompanied only with one Dragoman or Interpreter: the rest of his Traine were conducted into a low gallerie, whereas dinner was prepared for them after the Turkish manner: That is to say, a great Tapestrie vpon the ground without cloath or napkins, and some dishes thinne set. The meat was water-gruel with sugar, and some pottage with pullets: there were two men either of them holding a certaine instrument of sodden leather, in which there was a beuerage which they call Cerbet, made of the juice of Lymmons, water, and sugar, and withall they held a cup of blanch copper, giuing to euery one drinke, and going among the dishes to serue them more commodiously. From this feast, distastefull to them that had li-

At the entrie of this Imperial chamber stood six Capigi or Porters, whereof two of them tooke the Embassador vnder the armes, and led him to kisse the Sultans hand, or rather his Robe; for hauing saluted him from the greatest of Christian Kings, he kist but his Robe,

But they could hardly see the Sultan, for his face was turned towards a window that was grated, before the which, during the ceremonie there past 30 Capigi, euery one carrying a piece of the Presents which the Embassadour had brought: during the which, the Frenchmen could not see him but on the other side. This saluation being ended, the Embassador made a short speech, and presented vnto the Sultan the principal letter of his embassage, written in the Turkish tongue.

Trouble in Transyluania.

This past at Constantinople, whereas the Sultan did willingly see an Embassador his Allye, whom he honored aboue all others. But in Transyluania the affaires went after another strain; the combustions which seemed inseparable to this miserable Prouince, made it still the theater of all disor[illegible] Gabriel Battori, who gouerned it since the cession of Ragotzi, had put himselfe into the Turks protection, against King Matthias, who pretended a title, by reason of the cession made by Prince Sigismund vnto the Emperour, as King of Hungarie, and had recouered Hermstad, and chased Radwille Vayuod of Valachia out of his Countrey: where hauing settled a new Gouernour, and filled the garrisons with Haiduckes, he returned toward Transyluania, to oppose himselfe against Fortgatsie King Matthias his Lieut[illegible], who came with Troupes out of high Hungarie, and past the riuer of Tibisce. The Vayuod Radwille had retyred himselfe into Moldauia to Prince Constantine, whom he gaue to vnderstand, That Battori had an intent to seise vpon his Country, and to make but one Monarchie of their three Prouinces: whereupon they joyned their forces together, and in the end of Iune entered into Valachia, from whence they expelled Battori his Lieutenant with all the garrisons. This exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the prosperitie of their armes; they entered into Transyluania, whereas they pursued Battori with such diligence, as they forced him to come to a battell neere vnto Cromstat, the which he lost with part of his troupes, being constrained to saue himselfe with his horsemen in Hermstad, whereas [illegible] of the chiefe inhabitants seeing him receiue this disgrace, attempted to submit themselues vnder the obedience of king Matthias: but the practise being discouered by him, he did such execution, as he purchased to himselfe the name of Cruell.

The Valachian expelled his Country by Battori.

Battori defeated by the Valachian.

Fortgatsie his Lieutenant in King Matthias ouerthrow Transyluania.

In the meane time Fortgatsie Lieutenant to King Matthias, maketh vse of this defeat to seise vpon Transyluania; hee made an Accord with Andrew Nage (who had drawne high Hungarie into rebellion, and caused the Haiduckes to reuolt) so as being freed from that feare, he entereth into Transyluania; where hauing taken some Townes and Castles, he layed siege to Clausenburg, the which he battered so furiously, as the garrison and inhabitants seeing themselues readie to be forced, yeelded, and tooke the Oath of allegeance to King Matthias the fiue and twentieth of Iuly. But as these prosperities of Fortgatsie were humane, so did they not long continue. Battori being shut vp in Hermstad, conjures all his friends to come vnto him, and entreated the Bassa's of Buda and Temeswarc to succour him, according to the commandement which they had receiued from the Grand Seignior: he practised with Nage (a man which did swimme continually in the floats of inconstancie) and makes him to reuolt againe in high Hungarie, vpon a promise, That Fortgatsie had not kept promise with him; so as Nage tooke armes againe, seised vpon the Fort of Bayens, and filled all high Hungarie with combustions; so as Fortgatsie could expect no succours at his need from thence: then hauing receiued some forces from the Turkes and Tartarians, he went to field, pursuing Fortgatsie with such heat and furie, as he forced him to abandon all that he had taken in Transyluania, and to retyre into Valachia. What desolations did this warre bring vnto these Prouinces by so many prises and reprises? Battori going with a thousand horse to surprise Tocai, vpon the frontiers of Valachia, whereas they then held a great faire, he found the garrison so watch full vpon their guard, as hauing lost part of his horsemen, he was forced to returne into Transyluania.

Battori his practise.

Fortgatsie expelled Transiluania by Battori.

Fortgatsie his memorable retreat.

On the other side, Fortgatsie with his Hungarians, thinking from Valachia to recouer high Hungarie by the Countrey of the Zeclerians, could not effect his designe: for Battori being aduertised thereof, stopped his passage, and in like manner the Earles of Bucheime and Dampier had passed the riuer of Tibisce to meet him: so as Battori set such guards in all the passages and streights, that Fortgatsie was forced to retyre towards Polonia by the steep mountains, and desart places, whereas his armie was so oppresst with famin and all other necessities, as they perished miserably, there remaining few aliue; with the which he ended his passage into Polonia, and from thence soone after he returned into Hungarie, but with a verie poore equipage.

Thus the storme ceasing in Transyluania by the restraint of Fortgatsie, a more violent tempest

A tempest riseth in Moldauia, to the end that these vnfortunate Regions should neuer be without some touch of miserie: For the Turke hauing vnderstood, That Constantine Prince of that countrey had relieued the Valachian against Battori his allye, or rather his Tributarie, he sends a new Prince into Moldauia, the supposed sonne of one Thomas, or Aaron as some write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteene hundred souldiers, with Letters of command to the Turkes and Tartarians thereabouts, to assist him with their Forces. This new Prince was sometime in France, and afterwards detained prisoner in the Fort of Iaques in Spaine, within the Pyrenean mountaines. Thus two Princes contend for Moldauia, the one supported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turke. But behold, a third Prince commeth in and pretends a title, being sonne to one Ianicole who had commanded there. This man had beene a prisoner in the blacke Tower at Constantinople, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that hee had lost a battell in the yeare 1601, against Michael, who then possest Moldauia; who escaping from thence, wandred through diuers countries, and at last comming into England, his Majestie of Great Britaine pitying his miserable estate, recommended him by his Letters to Sir Thomas Glouer his Majesties Embassador, then residing at Constantinople, with commandement to assist him, and to solicite his restitution with the Grand Seignior. Vpon the receit of which Letters, he retyred this wandering Prince into his house at Pera, where he entertained him, with many of his friends and followers which repaired vnto him, for a long time; and in the meane time hee solicited the Grand Seignior for his restitution, hauing good accesse vnto him, by reason that hee spake the Turkish tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman or Interpreter. To whom the Sultan still gaue good answers, but with delayes, that it was not yet time; but hee should haue satisfaction. His Competitor (who was in possession of Moldauia) hearing of this practise, made friends at the Great Turks Court, and corrupted some of the Bassa's by bribes, (they being all by nature verie couetous) to the end he might crosse his designe, and make him away if it were possible: and among the rest he had woon Marath Bassa the grand Visier, a man of great power and authoritie, who practised many meanes to get the Moldauian into his hands. First, he sent word vnto the Embassador, That the Sultan hauing a meaning to restore him, desired to see the man, if he were capable of the place or no: but being aduertised of their intent, and well acquainted with their practises, hee refused to send him. After which, he wrot vnto him, That it was the Graund Seigniours pleasure hee should send the Moldauian vnto him, that hee might confer with him. To whom the Embassador made answer, That vnlesse he might see a Warrant vnder the Grand Seigniours owne hand, he would not deliuer him. Marath Bassa seeing that none of these practises could preuaile, resolued to fetch him out by force. For the effecting whereof he drew together two thousand Ianizaries. The Embassador hearing of his intent, fortified his house, and armed his people with the Moldauians which were with their Prince, meaning to stand vpon his defence. Marath Bassa desirous to know what the Embassadour did in his Lodging, disguised a Ianizarie like vnto a Greekish Sheepheard; who entering into the Embassadours house, found them all in armes: then returning vnto the Bassa, hee told him that he had to do with a mad man, and if he proceeded in his enterprise, hee would hazard the losse of many Ianizaries: whereupon hee gaue it ouer. After which, the Embassadour being called home into England, the Moldauian despairing of restitution from the Turkish Sultan, he turned Turke, and being presented to the Grand Seignior, was made Bey of Bursia in Asia: the which he enjoyed not long; for Nassuf comming from the Persian warres, discharged him. Thus Moldauia hauing many pretending Soueraignes, suffered many miseries, and was a prey to Turke, Tartarians, and Polonians, all partisans to these Soueraignes.

Troubles in Moldauia.

The negotiation of the Embassador of England, for one of the Princes of Moldauia.

These were the troubles which the Turkes caused at land for the ruine of the Christians. But behold what hee suffered at sea by the Gallies of Florence, Malta, and Naples; the Florentines made their enterprise apart. The Great Duke of Tuscanie being aduertised, That the Caruan which transported the Tribute of Ægypt to Constantinople, prepared to put to sea, he resolued to diuert this tribute, and by the valour of his armes to bring it to Ligorne: and for the effecting hereof, hee speedily armed foure Gallions, vnder the command of Beauregard a Frenchman, who was Admiral. The first was called the new Gallion, in which the said Admiral went: the second, the great Ligorne, commanded by Brandequeder, dor, Generall at land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commanded by two French Captaines. Beauregard hauing receiued commandement, to passe with this fleet into the Leuant, to meet with the Carauan, hee bent his course towards Candie, a fertile Island inhabited by the Græcians: Being arriued in the port of Calismene to water, he continued there six daies. Leauing this Island, he sailed towards Cyprus, which is held by the Turks, and so coasting Si[illegible] they learned of a ship of Marseilles, that the Carauan was yet in the port of Alexandria, where they prep[illegible] for their voyage to Constantinople. To attend them, the Admirall Beauregard, went and cast anchor at the fort of Sidon, called Sarepta, gouerned by Emir, or Armir Facardin, a Rebell to the Turke, and a great friend to the Florentines, where hee stayed twelue dayes, to take in Bisket, flesh, and other necessarie refreshi[illegible]. And hauing made a more strict league of friendship with Facardin, hee honoured him [illegible] a coffer full of armes, whereby the Florentines ships came as freely into those parts, as into their owne countrey.

The enterprise to take the Carauan of Ægypt.

Beauregard hauing well victualled and munitioned his gallions, hee returned towards the Isle of Cyprus, whereas he found a Christians ship called the flying Dragon, which came from Damietta, by whom he was assured that the Turks army, consisting of a great number of gallies, was gone out of the port of Rhodes, and had taken a Flemish ship. These newes made him thinke that hee should meet the fleet, and that he must of force defend himselfe. Wherefore he made all things readie, and prescribed the order which his Captaines should hold during the fight; causing his ordnance to be mounted as if they were to ioyne. He had foure as good gallions, and as well furnished, as any were in the Leu[illegible] seas, either of them beeing armed with 40 pieces of ordnance, and 400 good souldiers. Betwixt the Island of Cyprus and Caramania they encountered this Turkish fleet, consisting of fortie gallies and two galliasses, vnder the command of Bassa Mustapha Grego, who was Generall of this fleet, which was in sight of the Florentines ships: the galliasses aduance to take view of them, and to find how far their cannon would reach; and in the meane time the gallies put themselues into the forme of a Croissant, readie for the combat. Beauregard an old sea Captaine, and well practised in sea fights, would not make a shot against the gallies, but attended vntill the whole fleet came close vp to him; which being neere, he saluted them so furiously with his cannon, giuing them the broad sides, as the Turks (who expected no such reception) were all amazed; and making a stand, would proceed no further. Their Generall hauing well obserued the resolute countenance of the Florentines, diuided his gallies into two squadrons; giuing charge to the one to giue an assault to the Florentines gallies; and in the mean time the rest should prepare themselues to fight.

The Florentines meet with the Turkes fleet.

The Turks assaile the gallies of Florence.

Being thus diuided, they came one after another to the assault, the which continued for the space of six houres, and yet could not boord them. Mustapha seeing fiue of his gallies sunke by the enemies cannon, with the losse of all the men that were within them; but suddenly the wind changed, and proued fauorable to the Florentines, who embraced this aduantage, giuing chase to the Turks gallies, forcing them to seeke their safetie in the hauen of Famagusta, the chiefe fort of Cyprus; so of assailants (being beaten) they became run-awaies: so inconstant are the accidents of war; and especially at sea, whereas the good or bad successe many times dependeth of a little winde.

The Turks put to flight.

This Turkish fleet, hauing lost fiue gallies, and recouered a port in Cyprus, the Admirall Beauregard seeing his designe against the Carauan disappointed, he resolued to return towards Ligorne with his gallions: being at sea, he encountred a Turkish vessell called a Caramousall, which came from Rhodes, to go vnto Cyprus: they chased it, & in the end ouertook it; which they prest so with their ordnance, as they slew 130 Turkes, and tooke 300 slaues. The boocie was verie rich, being valued at 140000 crownes. After this prize, their victuals beginning to faile, hauing beene so long at sea, they bent their course for Ligorne: but the winde falling contrary, they were forced to stay eight dayes in the Island of Scarpante, past the bar of Messina, and hauing giuen chase to certaine gallies of Tunes, they arriued at Ligorne the fifteenth of Iune, where there was great ioy for their returne, and the prize which they had brought, the which according to the custome was to be diuided; one third to the souldiers and mariners, and the other two parts imploied for the entertainment of the ships, and the paiment of the captaines.

This

This Carauan which goes from Ægypt to Constantinople, is euerie yeare attended for, not onely by the gallions and gallies of Florence, but by those of Malta and Naples, and by all the Pyrats of the Mediterranean sea: like vnto the English and Hollanders, who yearely lay in wait for the Indian fleet before the conclusion of the peace and truce with the Spaniard. And although their principal designe was to take some part of the Carauan, yet they had other enterprises vpon the Turkes Countrey, besides the spoile of merchants which they met by chance, which many times payed the charge of their voyage; and sometimes, they that thought to take, were taken, and lost both their ships and liues.

The gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailife of Venouge, and those of Naples by the Marquis of S. Croix, joyned together soone after, with a designe to set vpon the Carauan which carried the reuenue and tribute of Ægypt to Constantinople, or els to put in execution the enterprise which they had long before projected, vpon certaine places of Albania, or to surprise or spoile some Island in the Archipelague which might pay their charges. But the first sailing, they met with a Venetian ship laden with merchandise, to the value of 100000 crownes. The Spaniards who commanded in the gallies of Naples seised vpon this ship, but the General of Malta would by no meanes consent vnto it, nor suffer any of the merchandise to be put into his gallies, for that he would not vniustly violate the friendship which was betwixt his Order and the State of Venice. This example did touch the Spaniards consciences, so as within few dayes they sent away the Venetian ship, but in curtesie they had vnloden all the merchandise.

The exploits of the Galleyes of Malta and Naples.

A Venetian ship taken.

After this prey of a Christian ship, the fleet discouered two sailes at sea, sending presently after them, they were two Barks, the one comming from Candie loaden with wood, and the other from Scarpante charged with wine, the which being brought vnto the Generals, gaue them to vnderstand, that the Carauan of Ægypt was not yet past, being aduertised that fiftie Christians gallies attended them in their passage. Vpon this aduice, the Christian Generals beeing out of hope to surprise the Carauan, presently resolued to vndertake a more great and glorious enterprise, and to surprise the Island and castle of Lango in the Archipelague, vpon the coast of Natolia; and about seuen of the clocke at night they set saile with a good winde, but being changed in the morning, they were forced te returne to the Island of Porcherne: from whence they parted againe at eight of the clocke at night, and continuing their course, in the morning they discouered three Florentine ships, who told them, that they had entred into the Isle of Nigropont with seuen gallies; but hauing been discouered, they could not effect any thing; and that their gallies were separated from them in the chace of foure galliots. The Christian fleet continuing their course, they arriued about eleuen of the clocke in the morning at S. Iean de Seruaë, where hauing cast anchor, there was a Councel called in the Admiral: where they resolued to petard the castle of Lango, toward the sea: for the execution whereof they should land 200 men; viz. thirtie Knights and fiftie souldiers out of the gallies of Malta, and 120 Spaniards out of the gallies of Naples; and that they should carrie two petards with them, the one giuen in charge to Captain Beaulaigue in the troupe of them of Malta, and the other was conducted by the Spaniards; the rest of their men which they should land, should go and assault the towne of Lango. With this resolution they parted from S. Iean de Seruaë, with a good winde, and arriued at the Island of Lango on the sixt of Iune, an houre after midnight, whereas they landed three miles from the towne: they that were appointed for the enterprise, marcht on with their petards, according to direction; but the night being very darke, the troupe of Malta strayed from their guide, but their valour brought them directly to the walls of the Towne; where after many turnings and windings to finde a fit place to plant the Petard, (notwithstanding that they were discouered and much shot at) Beaulaigue set it to a Port next the sea, well flanckt with the Castle, the which he forced, and his men entering with furie, went from street to street, and put all to the sword that made resistance. The Spaniards on the other side made another breach with their Petarde, and entered the Towne; notwithstanding that at their first approach, the Turkes (hauing discouered them) played vpon them with their great ordnance and small shot. The Troupes being joyned together, hauing cut all the Turkes in pieces they met with, they came to the place before the Castle, which they thought to surprise: but the bridge was drawne, and they lay open at the mercie of their shot; so as there were fifteene Knights of Malta hurt, one slaine, with a Spanish captaine, and some six and thirtie souldiers of the gallies of Naples, and as many wounded. Day being come, the Bailife of Venouge General of the gallies of Malta, came vnto the towne with the foreward, wherein were 150 Knights, and 450 souldiers: the Marquis of S. Croix followed him with the two sonnes of the Viceroy of Naples, and 1500 Spaniards, who spoiled the towne and suburbs, and tooke all that were liuing captiue: but the Castle being well fortified, they found it impossible to force; whereupon embarking their men and spoile, they resolued in their return to Malta and Naples, to make an enterprise vpon some towns of Albania: but vpon the way they were aduertised, That the Turks had discouered the intelligence which the Spaniards & knights of Malta had with the Grecians of the country; whereupon they tooke reuenge vpon them, putting many of them to death, and amongst others a Patriarch, who being accused to haue practised the Christians reuolt against the Turks, was cruelly fleied aliue, and his skin sent to Constantinople. So dangerous a thing it is to seeke for liberty with this Mahometane nation.

An enterprise vpon Albania discouered by the Turkes.

A Patriarch of Greece fleyed aliue.

The Carauan of Ægypt was still in the port of Alexandria attending a passage, and to be freed from so many Christian gallies which lay in weight for it; and it stayed the longer by reason of the great plague, wherwith Constantinople was afflicted. But in the end of October, Mechmet Bassa of Caire (who would conduct it in person) hauing a conuoy of fiftie gallies well armed, put to sea, and arriued at Constantinople without any encounter. At his landing, this Bassa caused to march before him 60 mules, euerie one laden with 20000 Sequins in kind, being a whole yeares tribute of the kingdome of Ægypt, the which he caused to be carried to the Sultans Serail. This money was welcome to the Port: for the former wars both in Hungarie, Transyluania, in Asia against the Rebels, and in Persia, had so wasted the Emperors treasure, as it would hardly entertaine one of his armies. The Bassa who had gathered this tribute together faithfully and with great diligence, was at his comming to the Sultans Port honored with the charge of Bassa of the sea, (he who had it before, being aduanced to the dignitie of Visier) and moreouer the Sultan promised him his daughter in marriage, being but three yeres old.

The Carauan of Ægypt arriues at Constantinople.

The Bassa's recompence that brought it.

Newes came to the Port, that certaine ships, gallies, and galliasses of the Christians, to the number of fiftie, came neere vnto the Hellespont; which put the Turkes in great feare: and complaints being brought vnto the Grand Seignior, That certain Caramousals had been taken by the Christian gallies; he sent presently for the Captain Bassa or Admiral of the sea, demanding of him, Whether the report of the losses were true or no? To whom he answered yes. Why are not you then at sea, saith he? He answered, For that I can get neither men nor money. Whereupon the Defterdar or Treasurer was sent for, who had lost his head, had not the Aga of the Grand Seigniors women entreated for him.

The Turkes are in feare of the Christians gallies.

This Summer Constantinople and the Countrey thereabouts was so plagued with such clouds of grassehoppers, as they did shadow the verie Sunne beames, and fell vpon the Citie and countrey round about. The Turkes consulted with their Wisemen, what it might portend: Who answered, That they did foreshew great plentie to follow. But indeed they left not a greene hearbe nor a leafe in all the Countrey adioyning, nor in the citie, where they entered into their verie chambers, and annoyed them much, being almost as bigge as dormice, with red wings. And soone after there fell such extraordinarie great haile in Constantinople and Gallata, with such aboundance of raine, as the violence of the water did suddenly shut vp one of the gates of the citie, and so rebounding filled their shops and houses, that verie manie were in great danger of drowning. Some houses fell downe, and some people were slaine; the pauements of the streets were torne vp, and the stones carried together into great heapes.

Grassehoppers at Constantinople spoyle the Countrie.

Violent raine in the Citie.

We haue formerly made relation of the Persians victories, and of the defeat and death of Cicala General of the Turkes armie, in the yeare 1605. And that the yeare following, the Sophy hauing recouered whatsoeuer the Turkes had taken from his Predecessors, had extended the bounds of his Empire vnto the blacke sea, from whence he sent an Embassadour vnto the Grand Seignior, to let him vnderstand, that hauing recouered what had beene vnjustly vsurped from him, he would proceed no further, but desired to liue in peace; the which might now be the better affected, the one holding nothing from the other. Moreouer, this Persian Embassadour hauing remained seuen moneths at the Sultans Port, was in the end forced to retyre retire into Persia without audience. And lastly, That Amurath Serder the Grand Visier, was afterwards forced to conuert his armes against Gambolat and the Rebels of Asia, and to neglect the war of Persia.

Notwithstanding the Persian war, there arriued this yeare at Constantinople an Embassadour from Persia, who according to the Turkes manner, was attended on by a great troupe of Chaoux on horsebacke, Capigi's, Ianizaries, and other Captaines, sent by the Sultan to conduct him to his lodging. Within few dayes after his arriuall, there was a great show made in Constantinople, by the seuerall trades of the citie, euerie one marching by themselues before the Grand Seigniors Serrail, and representing vnto him their manner of marching in the wars, and the order of their prouision; some carrying on their shoulders sheepe, others lambs, calues, beefe, &c. All which was done of policie to daunt and dishearten the Persian Embassador, and to encourage their owne people; and withall to let him know, that there should be as great plentie in their campes, as he saw at that present. And to abuse him still with the imagination of their great preparation, the Chimacham or Visiers Lieutenant, sent the next day for this Persian Embassador, and during their conference had taken order, That the Emperor of Tartaria's brother (who was then in the Sultans court) should come in: at whose entrance the Chimacham arose from his place; Ob (saith he) I know for what you come, It is for money for your souldiers: you shall receiue it at such a place. Which words were heard by a Dragoman to the English Embassador, being then present: the which was done to terrifie the Persian Embassador: and at the same time and to the same end they sent ouer diuers troupes of souldiers to Scudaret, as if they had been ready to march with an armie. 1611 A Persian Embassador comes to Constantinople

The Turks great armies are not raised in haste, neither doe they march in post: when as the Spahi's, that is to say the horsemen, which make the greatest part of his armie, and haue no other pay or entertainment than the reuenues of certain land, are discharged, they must haue a whole yeare to recouer their reuenue, and to put themselues in equipage; and moreouer, it is threescore dayes march for an armie, from Constantinople into Persia. The Turkes armie against the Persian.

Also in the yeare 1609 and 1610, the Turke had not attempted any thing against the Persian, who still solicited him for peace. The greatnesse of the Othoman Empire could not resolue to make a peace, hauing receiued so great defeats; they would giue it but as victors, not as vanquished. But this yere Achmat resolued to send a puissant armie of aboue 150000 men, against this antient enemie of his house, vnder the command of Amurath Serder his Grand Visier: But before the armie entered into Persia, it was without a commander, by the death of Serder, in the end of Iuly; so as they were forced to stay and attend the Sultans pleasure from Constantinople. The death of Amurath Serder.

It was suspected that hee had beene poysoned by Nassuf Bassa, one that stood out in rebellion against the Graund Seigniour, and yet hee had many friendes in the Turkes armie: Wherefore to preuent all mutinies, and consequently, the ouerthrowe of the whole armie, Amurath Bassa in his sickenesse aduised the Graund Seigniour (by letters which hee sent vnto him) to make Nassuf Generall of the whole armie, and so by faire meanes to drawe him home, and then to dispose of him at his pleasure. The Sultan with his Bassaes approoued well of this aduice, and chose him Graund Visier, and Generall of the armie; who hauing receiued the Seale and Authoritie, did forthwith put many of Amurath his friends to death, and with their money payed all the souldiers, which had wanted pay, whereof some had beene without fiue yeares before: hee also sent vnto the Graund Seigniour threescore and ten Mules loaden with money of Amuraths treasure, and threescore with goods; all which the Sultan gaue to Amurath his wife and children.

It is strange to read, how the Grand Seigniour doth tyrannise ouer his subiects, and how seuerely he doth punish the least omission in any of his officers: for I find it obserued, that the seuenth of Ianuary in the end of this yere 1611, the grand Seignior being abroad in the snow, and not well prouided for of fuell, he caused Stambol Aga who had that charge to be stript naked, and set in the snow foure or fiue houres. Indeed this Winter was very rigorous, and there fell aboundance of snow throughout all Turkie, with great stormes, manie houses were beaten downe; and amongst other the French Consull at Aleppo was slaine with the fall of his owne house. Severitie of the Sultan.

Nassuf

Naſſuf parted from Aſia, and marched with his armie vnto the frontiers of Perſia, where he committed ſuch ſpoiles, as the Sophie was conſtrained to draw all his forces together, to preuent the ruine of his countrey, beeing then about the midſt of Auguſt. But when they were come to a battell, the Perſian finding the partie vnequall for him, and dangerous, offered conditions of peace, and promiſed to giue the Turke a quantitie of ſilke which ſhould make the charge of 200 cammels, for a yearely tribute, in acknowledgement of ſome countries which he had conquered from the Othomans. Theſe offers were accepted at Conſtantinople, but there was added, that the Perſians ſonne ſhould bee called Baſſa of Tauris; and that the magiſtrat and Iudge of that citie, called the Cady, ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. We ſhall ſee in the following yeare the effects of theſe propoſitions. For the Embaſſadour of Perſia, whome Naſſuf ſhall bring to Conſtantinople; in the meane time let vs returne to the Mediterranean ſea, to take a ſurucy of the valiant exploits of the Knights of Malta againſt the Turkes.

The Perſian offers conditions of peace, and a tribute.

On the 26 of Aprill, a Turke hauing lent a good ſum of money to a Chriſtian, to be paid at a certaine day; he came before the appointed day with another Turke, and willed the Chriſtian to pay the mony to that other Turke when the day came; which the Chriſtian promiſed to do, and performed it accordingly: but the Turke denied the receit thereof: whereupon he to whom the mony was properly due, came and demanded it: to whom the Chriſtian anſwered, that hee had paied it to that partie to whom he had aſſigned it: whereunto the Turke replied, that if it were ſo, he was ſatisfied: but yet the other Turke denied it: wherupon the matter was brought before the Iudge, and the Turke who had receiued the money, taking an oath to the contrary; the Chriſtian according to the Turkiſh juſtice, was enforced to pay the mony again: the which he did, but withall he praied God to ſhew ſome publique ſigne which of them had done the wrong. And thereupon the Turke going forth to repaire home to his houſe, fell downe dead in the ſtreet.

The falſhood of a Turke puniſhed by the Iuſtice of God.

The Great Maſter Vignancourt continuing his generous deſignes to ruine the Turke, had an enterpriſe againſt Nauarrin, a place importing this common enemy of Chriſtians: for the execution whereof, he ſent the fiue gallies of his Order, vnder the charge of Vaqueras, great commander of the order, and chiefe of the nation of Prouence. They came within ſome miles of the ſhore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had bin diſcouered by one of the caſtles of Nauarrin, which had giuen the alarme vnto the whole countrey, ſo as they were forced to paſſe on to ſome more eaſie conqueſt, to the end their voyage might not proue vnprofitable: wherefore they ſailed into the Archipelague, and came neere to the coaſt of Morea, ten leagues from Corinth, where in the night they landed 800 men vnder the conduct of the commander of Cremeaux, generall at land; this troupe marched towards Corinth, and an houre before day were at the town gates to force them. Some Turks tooke armes, but their weake reſiſtance could not ſtay the knights from entring with their troupes; they ſackt the towne, and hauing taken what ſpoile was portable, they carried away with them 500 ſlaues. After this triumph, the Chriſtians made a happie retreat, & in good order, notwithſtanding all the attempts of the Turks horſe and foot, who were drawne together in great numbers, making 10000 ſoldiers, for the country is very populous; in view of whom they imbarked their ſpoile and ſlaues. Hereby it appeares, that this was one of the moſt deſperat enterpriſes that hath been of long time ſeene. For to attempt a place ſo far from their retreat, in ſo populous a countrey, which vpon the leſt alarme, may draw together ten or twelue thouſand Turkes, and to make their retreat with ſo ſmall a number, againſt ſuch great troupes which purſued them: doubtleſſe we muſt confeſſe, that as they ſhewed great valor, and had good fortune, ſo they vndertooke a very dangerous enterpriſe. Thus the knights of Malta vanquiſhed, whom we might terme the maſters of the Mediterranean ſea, if the reuenues of their Order would ſuffer them to ſet forth ſhipping and forces equall to their valour.

Corinth taken and ſpoiled by the knights of Malta.

But to follow the variable courſe of the Hiſtorie, let vs obſerue the diffrent occupations of Chriſtians. At Prague the Germanes entertained themſelues, with the conſideration of a Crowne which appeared in the Firmament, ouer that Citie about the middeſt of October, giuing a verie great light, and about it armies of men fighting who ſhould haue it. At that time the Emperour Rodulphus was vpon the Weſt, or declining of his dayes, and Matthias who ſucceeded him in the Empire, then King of Hungarie, was vp-on the ſunne-riſing of his triumphes. Many expounded this heauenly apparition, as a preſage of happineſſe and good fortune to Matthias: hee enioyed the Crowne of Hungarie already, and by deſignation that of Bohemia, and now they did prognoſticate vnto him that of the Romanes. Doubtleſſe men which aſpire after great fortunes, doe rather adorne the Sunne-riſing, than the ſetting; and mans life when it declines, taſtes of the lees. The flouriſhing glorie of Matthias, his age, and his actions in the warres, did adde nothing to the authoritie of other men in the countrie, but did mightily ſettle his owne. Three Sunnes which were ſeene in the firmament ouer Vienna, the chiefe citie of Auſtria, confirmed the Germanes more in this their hope, that he ſhould haue the third crowne of the Romans. This laſt apparition happened the yeare following.

About the end of the yeare, ſome of the Engliſh Embaſſadors men entering into quarrell with certaine Iamoglans of the next Setail: from words they fel to blowes, during which tumult one of the Embaſſadors men threw a ſtone, and ſmote a Iamoglan on the forehead, whereof he died within few houres after. The Aga of the ſeraill complained hereof to the grand Viſier, who preſently ſent the Subbaſſa of Galata, to make inquirie of the fact: the Embaſſadour went himſelfe to the Seraill, and ſent for his men which had been in the quarrell, willing the Turkes to deſigne the partie which had thrown the ſtone: who all with one ſhout ran vpon one Simon Dibbins, a man that was newly come from Candie, where hee had ſerued in the Venetian garriſons, and was now entertained into the Embaſſadors ſeruice. This Simon was not hee that threw the ſtone: notwithſtanding the Turkes would none but him; on him they laied hands, and dragged him away. The Embaſſador interpoſing himſelfe, and offring to pledge for him, was thruſt away by them, his men beaten, and one of his pages wounded: whereupon he complained to the grand Viſier, but preuailed little; for to priſon they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole month; neither could he be releaſed, albeit the Engliſh nation offered great ſums to ranſome his life: for the Turks would needs haue bloud for bloud. The day of execution being appointed, the Embaſſador ſent his chaplaine to the priſon where this Simon was, to prepare him for death: vnto whom (examining him how he had formerly liued) hee confeſſed, that in England ſome few yeres before he had killed a man, for which fact he fled thence into Candie: from whence he came to Conſtantinople, where he was to ſuffer for that which he did not: the juſt judgement of God purſuing him to the ſhedding of his bloud in Conſtantinople among Turkes vndeſeruedly, for the bloud which hee ſhed in England wilfully. He was hanged at the Embaſſadors gates, his head and heeles the next night were ſtollen away by the Turks, as it was thought, to vſe in ſome kind of Sorcerie; the other parts of his bodie they had leaue to take downe and burie.

This yeare 1612 they did celebrate at Conſtantinople a double nuptiall feaſt; for the marriages of Baſſa Mehemet ſonne to the deceaſed Cicala, with the Sultans ſiſter; and of Baſſa Mehmet, Admirall at ſea, hee whom we haue ſeene lately returne from Ægypt, and bring to Conſtantinople the reuenues of that rich kingdome, with the eldeſt daughter of his Emperour. For the feaſts of yong Cicala, the Spahi made courſes on horſebacke with battleaxes and barres, in the open place neere vnto the Seraill, where they made diuers fire-workes of verie great charge, but of ſmall inuention; and they gaue Preſents to aboue 20000 perſons, beſides the charge of the banqueting ſtuffe which amounted to aboue 20000 crownes. The pompe was double; for the Sultans women did celebrat that day with the greateſt ladies of the Port, and the men ſeparated in other places did ſolemniſe it in like manner. But the magnificence of the marriage of the Baſſa Admirall at ſea with Achmats eldeſt daughter, had far more luſtre at the Port. The ceremony was performed on the 30 of Iune, 20 daies after the other; and the order of this pompe, as well as ſome other which we haue deſcribed in this Hiſtorie, requires a particular relation.

The ceremonie at the daughters marriages.

The order of the brides truſſe or moueables.

The day before the conſummation of the marriage, they ſent the brides moueables and jewels, from the Seraill to the bridegroomes lodging, with this order and ſtate that followeth: Firſt there marched 500 Ianizaries on foot, being followed with the grand Prouoſt of Conſtantinople, and the generall Surueiour, both on horſebacke and attired in cloth of gold: the Aga or Colonell of the Ianizaries verie proudly adorned, and enuironed with ſome Ianizaries, marched alone on horſebacke: after theſe, two hundred men of qualitie well mounted, and richly attired, followed with a ſlow pace. The laſt which marcht in this pompe or ceremonie, monie, where the Talismans, Centons, Emirs, and other Ministers of Mahomets Clergie. And presently followed after the Bassa Achmat, Defterda, or high Treasurer, who conducted the moueables, as chosen by the Sultan to be Godfather or Sagois to the bride, being enuironed with twelue footmen attired in long robes of gold. After him followed the moueables, apparell, and jewels, which made the brides trusse, hauing in the head excellent musicke after the Turkish manner, of Hoboyes and Kettledrums on horsebacke, wherein the brides moueables consisted.

These moueables, or this trusse, consisted of 27 Presents. The first was a little hat all of gold, couered with precious stones, and with pantofles or womens shoes after the Turkish fashion of pure gold, enricht with Turquoises, and rubies: A booke of Mahomets Law, the couering whereof was of Massie gold all set with diamonds, many bracelets, and other rare deuises for women, of pure gold, with many precious stones: a little coffer a cubit long, and halfe as broad, all of christall of the rocke, hauing the corners of gold, in the which were to be seene great diamonds and huge pearles, to the value of 80000 pounds sterling: After this precious coffer, were carried many smockes embroidered with gold and pearle, and head-bands for the forehead, with many robes of cloath of gold. All this was distributed into 27 Presents as we haue said, and carried with great pompe by 27 men on foot.

The brides slaues.

After these Presents followed 11 caroches full of yong maidens, slaues to serue the bride: these caroches were couered and shut, and either of them attended by two eunuchs Moores: after these followed 28 virgins slaues, attired in cloth of gold, and accompanied by 28 blacke eunuches all on horsebacke, and richly clad. After which were seene 240 mules, loaden, with tents of tapestrie, cloath of gold, sattin, veluet, with the ground of gold, with many cushions, which are the chaires the ladies of Turkie vse; with many other rich and sumptuous moueables. Such was the Trusse which this yong Princesse brought to her spouses house. Doubtlesse this equipage was stately, and did well become the pompe and greatnesse of the Othomans house, from whence shee had issued, the mightiest and richest of all the royall houses in Europe, yea I dare boldly say of all the World.

The order of the brides conducting to her husband.

The marriage day being come, the bride was conducted to her husbands lodging with no lesse pompe and State than her moueables. The Ianizaries marched first as they had formerly done, being followed by the grand Prouost, the Surueior their Aga, and many other officers of the Port. The Emirs (who are descended from Mahomet, and alone carrie greene turbants)

Emirs & their priuiledges.

marched after to the number of 80: this name of Emir is as much to say as lord. They which weare them answer not, and obey none but their chiefe, called Mirabachi, and their voice in judgement stands for two: they were followed by the Talismans or Priests of Mahomets law, and by a great number which studie it, and which aspire to the offices of Cadi's or Iudges, of Cadilesquiers or Mufti. The Visiers are supreme Iudges of the Turks estate, who judge of all affaires in counsell, came after with the grand Visier, who is Lieutenant Generall to the Turkish Emperor throughout his whole Empire, and keeps the seales of his Empire. He had on his left hand (which is the most honourable ranke in Turkie) the grand Mufti, or supreme Bishop of their Law. The musicke followed after on horsebacke consisting of thirtie men with drums and Hoboies, beeing followed by eight Ægyptians, which carried Biscaine tabors, and did a thousand apish trickes. These were followed by 40 musitians, marching two and two, some playing of citerns, others of harps, and some of lutes after the Turkish manner. A foole (held for a Saint amongst them) being mused with a cap and a cloke couered with mutton bones, danced and sung with these instruments: 50 of the chiefe officers of the Arsenall marcht after them, and 30 men with hammers & other iron instruments, to breake down whatsoeuer aduanced too far in the streets, and might hinder the free passage of 2 trees of an immense height, laden with diuers sorts of fruits all of wax, carried by many men, & supported from the top and the midst with ropes. After these trees came 20 officers belonging to Achmat Bassa the high Treasurer, Godfather to the bride. And he himself alone richly attired, & proudly mounted: after whom came 2 great torches light, caried by many slaues, & then a third torch of a wonderfull bignesse, all couered with plats of gold, & shining more with precious stones than the flame which burnt. The Raisser Aga with 50 of the princesses officers, followed these lights, & after them was carried a great canopie of crimson veluet, and after it another greater, couered with plates of gold, whose curtaines being shut on all sides, hung downe to the ground. Vnder this canopie was the princes on horsebacke, with some of her black eunuches, her caroch followed

A lowed couered with cloth of gold, and drawne by foure great white horses, wonderfull beautiful. Then followed eight other caroches, in which were a great number of the brides maids, with many Negroes gelt; and finally, 25 virgin slaues, chosen amongst the fairest, all on horsbacke, hauing their haire confusedly hanging vpon their shoulders. Such was the pompe of this marriage: but many times the nuptiall feast is intermixt with funerall mourning. For not many daies after, the Sultans second daughter, promised to Nassuf Bassa, was carried to her graue without any pompe or honour: for the Turks make no great esteeme of women.

The death of the Sultans daughter.

The day after the marriage, the Grand Seignior did cruelly beat his Sultana, the mother of

The grand Seignior beats his Sultana.

B this daughter, whom he had married to the Captaine Bassa; he stabbed her with his handjarre or dagger thorow the cheeke, and trod her vnder his feet. The reason was, because shee had strangled a fauorit of his, which was one of his sisters slaues, whom the grand Seignior hauing seene, and being enamoured with her, sent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof, caused her to bee brought to her lodging, where shee stript her of her apparell, strangled her, and put her clothes vpon one of her owne slaues, whom she sent to the Sultan instead of the other, and at her returne strangled her also; as she had done many others when they once appeared to bee with childe by the Grand Seignior.

The plague beginning furiously to spoile the city of Constantinople, the Sultan was forced to returne to his countrey pallace, called the Serail of Darut Bassa, to auoid the danger of this violent contagion: the which makes mee thinke, that the Turkish Emperours for their owne

C profit dispense with some articles of their faith; for as we haue said before, The Turkes are so obstinatly tied to the beleefe of Predestination, as they will not vouchsafe to turne from a pestiferous bodie, when it is carried to the graue, and much lesse forbeare to visit his friends being sicke of the plague, for that (say they) if we must needs die of this contagion, it is in vaine to flie it, for it will find vs where soeuer; if not, our health shall neuer be empaired, although wee conuerse with those that are sicke of this disease. But their Sultans know well how to flie the danger; yea and to cause them to be led vnder the arms that come to kisse his hand, lest they should offer him some violence. Thus we see the defect of false religions, when as we see this marke of vniuersalitie in the faith taken away; for there euery man beleeues according to his priuat interest, as well as among many others which haue separated themselues from the truth, to canton themselues in their errors, where we doe often trie the diuersitie of their beliefe.

A Deruis seeketh to kill the Emperour.

D Sultan Achmat being in his palace of Darut Bassa, and going to visit a stately Mosque which he caused to be built there, a Deruis or religious Turke thrust on by some deuillish fury, cast a great stone at him to beat him downe; but the blow of this detestable traitor, fell vpon his shoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they should draw from this wretch the confession of his confederats: but the officers of the port caused him to be executed the next day, somewhat too suddenly, and by a death too honourable, for a crime so ful of abomination, for they caused his head to be cut off. A Deruis of the same order had in former times sought to murther the Emperor Mahomet the second.

The funerall of the lady Glouer the Embassiadors wife.

On the 14 of April, the ladie Anne Glouer, wife to sir Thomas Glouer, Embassador residing at Constantinople for the English, was buried with very great solemnitie, the like had not beene

E seene in that countrey, since the Turks conquered Constantinople. There were present at this funeral of most nations in the world; the sermon was preached in a large garden vnder a Cypres tree: and although but few of those present did vnderstand it, yet it wrought this effect, that whereas the Iesuits and Friers had formerly possest both Turks, Iewes, and other people, that the English nation since the change of their Religion, had neither churches, nor any forme of diuine seruice; hereby they perceiued, that they had both, and serued God far more decently and deuourly than they themselues, insomuch that the Iesuits being ashamed of their impostures, and slanderous vntruth, durst not for a while after walke the streets; for feare of the Turks, who threatned them for so much belying the English. The Sermon being ended, the bodie was caried from Pera vnto the English graues, which were almost a mile from the place;

F it was closed in lead, and layed in a Caroch couered ouer with blacke veluet, and the horses with blacke cloth. The Dutch Embassador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Colonell, with a great number of all nations both men and women followed her to her graue. The tombe was of faire marble built foure square almost the height of a man, hauing an Epitaph engrauen thereon.

The castle of Lango taken by the Florentines

Wee haue seene the yeare before, the Island and towne of Lango spoiled by the gallies of Malta and Naples, but the castle was saued from ruine, by the resistance it made against the Christians attempts: but this yeare in Iune the great Duke of Tuscans gallies running ouer the Archepelagie, assailed it so furiously, as they forced and spoiled it, carrying away twelue hundred prise[rs] Mechmet Bassa Admirall at sea, whom we saw euen now busied at his nuptiall pompe, w[ith] the Empere[ur]s eldest daughter, beeing aduertised of these spoyles of the Florentines, b[y] the dayly co[m]plaints of the Turks which lost their shipping, and of many other enterprises attempted vpo[n] his masters countries lying neere the sea shore; hee departed from Constantinople in August with three and thirtie great gallies, hauing commanded all the Beyes of the Islands and townes in the Archipelague, to joyne with him, wi[th] s many gallies as they could make, to stop the Christians courses in the West. But whil[e] at he is busied in those seas, the Pirats of Ruscia descending into the Euxine sea, by the mo[u]ths of those riuers which discharge their waters into the sea, ouerran and spoiled the Turks coasts in those parts.

Courses of the Russians and Tartars vpon the Turkes.

At the firme land Constantine one of the pretending Princes in Moldauia, annoyed all that had any dependance vpon the Turke. A part of that great army of the king of Polands, which had mutined for their pay, spoyled Podolia; and a Prince of the Tartarians discontent for that Achmat had preferred a cousin of his before him in the inuestiture of the realme of the Tartars Precopians, with 5000 souldiers spoiled the riuers of Mol[d]auia vnder the Turks dominion, and he did the like in the gulph of Nicopolis.

Troubles in Moldauia.

This was at such time when as miserable Moldauia was the theatre whereas the Turks, Tartars, and Moldauians acted a bloudie tragedie, at the costs and charges of the poore countreymen. For Tomsho hauing been cholen Vayuod or Prince of that Prouince by the Turke, Constantine who could not endure that he should raigne, armed the countrey, ouerran it, spoiled it, and made hauocke of all, detaining two Capigi prisoners, whom the Sultan had sent vnto him, with commandement to obey his will, and a prohibition not to trouble Tomsho in the possession of his Prouince. But this was a message of hard disgestion to Constantine; he could not with patience yeeld to this cession of Moldauia: and instead of sending these messengers backe to the Turke with an answer, hee carried them with him into Polonia, whither he went to demand succors, and caused them to be guarded as prisoners. In the meane time by the support and aid of Potosky Gouernor of Velin his brother in law, he obtained from the king of Poland, that he should be supported agai[n]st Prince Tomsho his competitor, whom the Turke had aduanced; and to make his entrie into M[o]ldauia more easie, they resolued to send an Embassador vnto Constantinople, to entreat [the Turke] to call backe Tomsho to his Port, that Constantine might quietly enjoy Moldauia, and to acquaint him with the right and interest the Polonians had by their capitulations with the Turkes, to name a Vayuod or Prince in that Prouince, to the end no wrong might be done vnto them.

A Polonian embassador arrested at Constantinople.

This Polonian Embassador being arriued at Constantinople (thinking to be presently dispatched, either by a grant or deniall of his demand, and not to stay aboue fifteene or twentie daies) beeing visited at his arriuall by all the Embassadours of Christian Kings and Princes which remained there: but in stead of audience, after six weekes attendance, hee was arrested and detained prisoner: vnderstanding from the Turkes, that he should haue no libertie vntill that the two Capigi, whome prince Constantine carried into Poland were released.

The troubles and diuisions among Christians, neighbours to the Turke, haue alwaies serued as a bridge for this Infidell to inuade them, and by this aduantage to vsurpe such townes and countries as lie fit for him. Now that Valachia, Moldauia, yea and Transyluania, are tost and turmoild with continuall disorders and combustions; the Sultan seemes to embrace this occasion, to make himselfe Soueraigne of these prouinces, and to get possession of all that lies betwixt the riuer of Danow, the mountaines of Sarmatia, the riuer of Tibiscus, and the Euxine sea. Hee emploies all his thoughts and inuentions vpon this subiect, to bring his designes to effect. Hee armes and drawes forces about Belgrade, vnder the conduct of Bassa Mahomet Belzergi: Hee commaunds the Tartarians to enter into Moldauia, and hee sent a nauall armie towards the mouth of the riuer, Dannow, which made the frigots of Russia to dislodge, the which had continually made inrodes and spoiles vpon his lands. Battori Prince of Transyluania was at that time before the Towne of Cromstad, which hee had besieged, besieged, but the tediousnesse of this siege made him resolue to send an Embassador to Constantinople, to demand succors from the Grand Seignior, to the end he might be able to continue this siege and to take the towne: he gaue this charge to Andrew Giezy, and sent him to the Sultans Port: but in stead of seruing his master faithfully, he practised a detestable treason against him, to put the Turke in full possession of Transyluania, and to make him absolute Soueraigne. The practise was concluded after this manner, That the Bassa Mahomet Belzergi should enter the Prouince with his armie, and that Giezy should joyne with him with certaine troupes, and should deliuer vnto him Veradin, Lippa, and some other strong and important places; and for recompence he should inuest him in the Principalitie of Transyluania, in the place of Battori, and vnder the authoritie of Achmat.

He demands succours from the Turke, and is betrayed.

This treason might haue drawne this miserable Prouince into ruine, and it may be the rest neere adjacent, if it had taken the effect which the trecherie of Giezy had promised vnto himselfe. But the Bassa of Buda vnderstanding that Battori had some vent of the practise at the Port, and that being now in great feare and perturbation, he had raised the siege from before Cromstad, and was readie to cast himselfe into the armes of the Palatine of Hungarie, and to craue reliefe from him; the craftie Bassa knowing that this course would be preiudiciall for the Sultan, and finding that the deposing of Battori would be more difficult than they expected, hee diuerted Mahomet Bassa from attempting any thing against Battori or Transyluania. This act shewes sufficiently, that Christian Princes which thinke to shelter themselues vnder the shadow of the Turkish Crescent, are verie ill assured: for hee neuer failes to stirre vp enemies against them, to make them sue for succours, and himselfe necessarie: Then in the end he expels them, and becomes absolute master of their countries. It was also said, That the Bassa Mahomet would not attempt any thing in Transyluania, by reason of the election of the Emperour Matthias, whereof the Bassa of Buda was assured by the Embassadour which the said Emperour sent to Constantinople, to carrie the presents vnto the Sultan; which Embassadour was honourably entertained at Buda by the said Bassa, and from thence conducted safely to Constantinople.

But not to keepe these Turkish troupes idle, Mahomet Bassa beeing aduertised that Constantine the pretending prince in Moldauia, had bin in Poland to craue some assistance from thence, he resolued to employ his forces that way, to dispossesse him and to settle another.

But the better to vnderstand the beginning and successe of these Moldauian warres, wee must make a repitition of that which past some yeares before. In the yeare 1608, Ieremie Mohyla Prince or Vayuod of Moldauia, died; committing the gouernement to his brother Simion, during the minoritie of his three sonnes, Constantine, Alexander, and Bougdan, the eldest beeing but eight yeares old. Hee left three daughters married to three generous Princes of Polonia, Potosky, Visinousky, and Corresky. Prince Simeon continued in the gouernement vntill the yeare 1611; after whose decease the young Prince Constantine by the persuasion of his mother, that he might safely take vpon him the gouernment of Moldauia, and not attend any confirmation from the Sultan, for that Prince Simeon who had beene confirmed by the Turke which then raigned, was but Tutor to his Nephew; entered the gouernement. At this time there remained at Constantinople, one Stephano or Tomsho, who had of a long time practised the fauour of one of the Visiers called Mehemet, an Eunuch of Georgia (who was then Chimacham, or Lieutenant to the Grand Visier) and of some other Bassaes, as well by money as by other practises, suggesting falsly that he was sonne to Prince Aaron, who had been Vayuod of Moldauia before the deceased Ieremie: and he preuailed so by his practises and corruption (whereunto the Turkes are more subiect than any Nation in the World) as he was admitted to the Principalitie by the Grand Seignior, and hauing giuen him to vnderstand by the Visier, that Constantine had thrust himselfe rashly into the gouernment, and that hee would not acknowledge him for his Lord and Soueraigne, nor pay the yearely tribute, which was 40000 chequines, hee sent Fousseyen Aga with 20000 Turkes and Tartarians to settle Stephen or Tomsho in Moldauia, and to expell Prince Constantine. Which armie marched so secretly, as they had in a manner surprised him; yet drawing together a head of 10000 men, hee resolued to attend the euent. The Aga sent to acquaint him with his commission, and among other things threatened him, that if he would not suffer him to proclaime Stephen Vayuod of Moldauia, and yeeld him the Citie of Yas free, he would cut him in pieces.

Where-

Constantines answer to the Turks Aga.

Whereunto Constantine made answer, by the aduice of the Prince Potosky his brother in law, That the Grand Seignior had been abused: for if hee had vnderstood, that his predecessor had granted vnto the deceased Prince Ieremy his father, and to Prince Simeon his vncle, That he should succeed his said father in the gouernment: it was not credible that he would seeke to dispossesse him by force, without hearing, and install in his place an vnknowne person, who had falsely supposed himselfe to bee the sonne of a Prince of Moldauia: neither should they finde, that he had refused to acknowledge the Sultan for his Soueraigne Prince, or denied to continue the same tribute which his father and vncle had paid: but if the Aga would proceed without any respect of his oathes, he did hope that the true God of battell would maintain him in his just defence, and would not suffer an vsurper to preuaile ouer a lawfull Prince. Fousseyen Aga, who had no will to capitulat with Prince Constantine, being corrupted by Stephen with Presents and promises, aduanced with his army, so as the next day they joyned battell; but the Moldauians oppressed with multitudes of Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky entreated Prince Constantine to saue himselfe, and to suffer him to finish the battell: but hee could by no meanes perswade him, still resoluing to attend the euent. Whereupon they went both againe to the charge with such troupes as they had left, and defeated many of the Turks forces; but being oppressed with a new supply of 2000 horse which the Aga sent by Stephen, they were constrained to yeeld themselues to the mercy of their enemies. Prince Constantine fell to the Tartarians share, either for that he had been taken prisoner by some of them, or else was giuen them by Fousseyen Aga, to draw a ransome from him, and be in stead of their pay. But they made no great vse of him, for as they led him away, passing the riuer of Niestre, hee leapt into it, thinking either to saue himselfe by swimming, or vnwilling to suruiue his disgrace. And as for Prince Potosky, he was carried to Constantinople, and was put into the blacke tower, which is a prison appointed by men of qualitie, where he continued vntill the yeare 1616. The losse of this battell by Constantine, gaue an easie enterance to Stephen into Moldauia, no man daring oppose himselfe against the Turks forces: so as Fousseyen Aga caused Stephen to be proclaimed Prince of Moldauia in the citie of Yas, and then dismissed his armie, and returned to Constantinople. Such was the fortune of the Prince of Moldauia, ruined by the Turks, and such was the disorder and confusion of his miserable countrey.

Constantine & Potosky taken prisoners.

Constantinople afflicted with grashoppers.

This Summer Constantinople and the countrey round about, was annoyed with aboundance of Grashoppers, as it had beene in the former yeare: but to free themselues from this deuouring vermine, about the middest of July, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and Alexandria, with diuers other Bishops, and Calloires attired in their copes and other ornaments, went forth in solemne manner at the gate of Andrianople, being the North gate of the citie. Whereupon (said the Greekes) they all perished: and indeed about this time infinit heaps of them were found dead; but not by reason of their curse, for most were dead before they cursed them, and were to be seene dead vpon euerie bush and twigge of a tree before their curse, and many liued after their curse, and continued vntill the next summer. The cold deawes which fell this Summer (beeing extraordinarie) were thought to bee the naturall cause thereof; God causing those deawes to fall, to free the countrey from these deuouring creatures.

The troubles of Transyluania.

Let vs now describe the miseries of the Transyluanian, and of his Prouince, a table so often represented in this Historie. Gabriel Battori who gouerned Transyluania, as lawfully descended from the Soueraigne Princes thereof, hauing made himselfe a tributarie vnto the Turke, and by his impious actions mingled Mahomets impietie with the Christian Religion; and moreouer, exceeding in his crueltie, became a memorable example to all posteritie, that Princes which carrie the glorious name of Christians, when they haue once layed aside all feare of the Soueraigne of Princes, cannot attend, but a miserable end in their raigne, conformable to the course of their enormities. So Gabriel Battori holding it a Law of State, to settle his affaires with the ruine of Religion, allyes himselfe with the Turke, and with him afflicts the Christian Prouinces. But seeing many factions made against him, as well by the descendents of Botscay, as by Giezi, Bethlem Gabor, and some other, hee supports himselfe with the forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the Rebels in high Hungarie, who came vnto him to the siege before Cronstad to assist him in his affaires. Battori entertained him with all shewes

A shewes of courtesie, inuited him to dinner in his Tent; and for a greater demonstration of friendship, after dinner they two went to take the aire on horseback. Nage had drunke after the Hungarian manner; Battori entreated him to runne his horse a careere, and he refused it; the which Battori taking for an offence, spake many words of contempt vnto him, and hee answered him in the same manner, being more inflamed with wine, than gouerned by reason. Battori being wonderfully offended, that a man of no sort, being but a poore souldier of fortune, crept vp to some authoritie among the soldiers but by degrees of rebellion, should giue him such words of indignitie, gaue him three blowes on the head with a battle-axe which hee held in his hand, and slew him. Thus Nage swims iustly in his owne bloud, hauing wickedly and to the ruine of his Country, floted in the wayes of inconstancie, and popular tumults; and so he died as he had liued.

Battori kills Nage.

B But Battori found himselfe dayly oppresst with many affaires, which draue him insensibly to his ruine. Peter Decaci Kinseman to the deceased Botscay annoyed him on the one side with troupes of souldiers. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his embassie to Constantinople) leuied Forces to prosecute him; and Bethlehem Gabor a Nobleman of Transyluania, and assisted by the Turke, tooke many places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raise his siege at Cromstad, and generally all Transyluania reuolted against this Prince. To see more plainely in the obscuritie of these confused disorders, you must vnderstand that this Prouince is peopled by three seueral Nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hungarians.

Parties against Battori.

C The Sicules (discended from the Scythians) came with Attila King of the Hunnes, in Pannonia, now called Hungarie, and taking their way towards their Countrey, they inhabited that part of Transyluania which lies next to Moldauia, and diuiding themselues into seuen Coloneys, they built the townes of Kisdi, Orbai, Scipsi, Cykuduarheh, Aranios, and Maros. The Saxons (mutinying against the gouernment of the Emperour Charlemaigne King of France) for certaine impositions wherewith hee had charged them) retyred into Transyluania, and by force seised on that part of the countrey which confineth vpon Valachia, where they built the townes of Hermenstad, (otherwise called Cibin) Cronstad, Nezen (or Bistric) Meduisch, Sciespourg, Clausenbourg, and Alba-Iulia. The Hungarians inhabited this prouince from the time of Saint Stephen King of Hungarie; and hauing mastered the other Nations, they obtained such preheminence among them, as since their successours haue Diuision of the people of Transyluania.

D caused themselues to be called Nobles of Transyluania, and the Vayuods or Princes of the Countrey haue beene taken from among them. The Townes of Varradin, Deuer, Zilahi, Gela, and some others, owe their beginnings vnto them. The greatest part of these three Nations which inhabit Transyluania, were reuolted against Battori: but particularly the Saxons had taken armes against him, his great crueltie hauing forced them to this extreame remedie.

All the three nations against Battori.

Battori being thus abandoned by his subjects, prosecuted by his Nobilitie, and forsaken of all the world, knowing not whither to flie for succour, and not daring to trust vnto the Turke, who openly fauoured Gabor; he resolued to trie if he could by presents draw the Emperour Matthias to giue him any assistance. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto him, to promise

E all subjection and obedience; and he sent for Presents, a long robe or sacerdotal cloake of gold, set with Pearle and pretious stones, certaine plumes of blacke Herons, adorned with pretious stones, a Turkish sword, the scabberd being of siluer richly set with iewels, tenne blacke horses with rich furniture embroidered with gold and siluer, and a Turkish horse hauing halfe the bodie and legges of the colour of gold, with his furniture of crimson richly embroidered. He laboured to haue the Emperor giue notice to the Bassa of Buda, that the attempt of the Turks against Transyluania, was against the Articles of peace [illegible] made answer, That his Emperour was not to be blamed if he seised vpon that prouince, since it did immediately belong vnto him, and kept it quiet from the practiles of others. But [illegible] relying not wholly vpon this support; but desiring to haue more strin[illegible] sent Embassadours to the Sultan, with rare and rich Presents, who had [illegible] with the Bassa's: the which Negromus the Emperours Embassadour [illegible] nop'e discouering, he sent word vnto the Emperour, that [illegible] men.

vania, complaining much of the crueltie and tyrannie of Battori. The Saxons (said they) li- G uing many peares in Transyluania, had beautified the Prouinces with townes, villages, and Markets, and had by their vertue obtained many priuiledges from former Emperors: but Bat- tori, against his promised faith, and the oath which he had taken, had depriued them of their priuiledges, and afflicted them in such sort, as they were in a manner ruined: that from his first enterance he had sought to root out the antient familie of the Saxons: that he had afflicted them with imprisonments & miserable seruitude, & had detained Iohn Benner 3 yeres in prison for no other cause, but for that he knew he had brought a great estate out of Germanie: hee had depriued honest widowes of their estates, and had oppresst others with vniust exactions: hee had surprised Hermstad the chiefe citie of the Saxons, and suffered the Hadoks to spoile it, and to commit all sorts of insolencies. That he had expelled the Magistrate, banished ho- H nest Citizens, rauished women, slaine the parents, to depriue the children of their inheritance, and committed all the barbarous cruelties that could be deuised. That he had sent three hundred captiues to the Sultan for a Present; many he cut into small pieces, some he had throwne downe from the tops of mountaines and towers; some he had hung vp by the feet, others hee had drawne in pieces with horses and trees, and to conclude, hee had practised all kindes of barbarous cruelties. That hauing expelled Religious Princes out of Moldauia and Valachia, hee had made them subject to the Turke, for no other end, but getting an occasion to circumuent the Christians, hee might waste all with fire and sword, hauing multitudes of Barbarians to second him; and for a conclusion of his notable crueltie, hauing freed the towne of Gaudin, he made choice of twentie of the principal inhabitants, and deliuering to euerie I one of them a pike, he forced them in his presence to kill one another in the midst of the market place.

Gabor and the Turke presse Battori.

But God reuengeth his excesse by his ruine, whereinto we shall presently see him run headlong miserably: for, Bethlem Gabor his capital enemie hauing joyned his forces with those of Bassa Serder, they both entered together into Transyluania, forced Lugasti, take Deue, and strike a great terror into the whole countrey. Ogli Bassa on the other side surmounts the difficultie of the wayes, and lodgeth with his troupes in the suburbs of Cromstad, and from thence went and camped ouer all the tract of Barry or Barsac. Thus Battori sees himselfe oppresst by an enemie from whom he can expect nothing but his miserie and ruine: he attended succours from the Emperor, vnder the conduct of the Palatine of Hungarie and Fortgatsie: they came, K but not such as were able to resist the Turke. This made him write to Trinan for the leuying of soldiers; but the hatred they bare him generally, deceiued his hopes, no man would march vnder his ensignes. This refusal makes him distrustfull, he dares not confer with any man touching the affaires of the war. A treatie of peace seemes more fit for his affaires; hee makes an ouerture to his most familiar friends, and tells them that he holds it necessarie to purchase his peace with Serder Bassa at what price soeuer; yea, were it in deliuering into his hands the places of greatest importance. But he receiues no other answers from them, but that they had rather die than aduise him to it. Thus he sees himselfe void of all hope of safetie in his affaires:
he wanted money, his subiects, yea euen his souldiers hated him, as a Prince abandoned to all crueltie; and for his last remedie, and the most ordinarie in base and cowardly mindes, hee fel L into dispaire, intreating one of his seruants to kil him; but the other refused him that honor, suffering him to draw on his miserable life, till that within some few dayes after, going forth to view where his troupes were lodged, being in an open chariot, accompanied onely with two gentlemen, fiftie of his soldiers (which attended him in an ambush) shot at him, slew him, and hurt those that did accompanie him. It is true, this accident hapned in the yeare 1613, when as this vnfortunate Battori went to giue an account vnto God of the bad gouernment of his estate.

The misteries and dispaire of Battori.

Battori slaine by his owne souldiers.

Bethlem Gabor made Prince of Transyluania by the Turke.

Some few dayes after, Bethlem Gabor was declared Prince of Transyluania by Bassa Ser- der, who gaue him this aduisement at his introduction; Battori shall serue for an example to bad Princes; I do not thinke that you will follow his steps. Beware you attempt not any thing without the priuitie of my Master: Maintaine peace with your Neighbours, and make men of experience and honestie of your Councell. Transyluania did yet feare the continuance of a storme of a fatall warre, when as in lesse than fortie dayes it saw it selfe settled in the calme of sweet peace, by the acknowledgement which all the Townes made vnto Bethlem Gabor, and

A the oath of fidelitie which they tooke vnto him, as to their elected Prince; notwithstanding that the Emperour employed all his credit to hinder it. But the desire of peace, and the feare of the Turkes armies, drew all the Gouernors of townes to acknowledge Gabor: such were the affaires of Transyluania, disordered by the Turke. Let vs now make an end of the remainder of the yeare 1612, the which we haue deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the affaires of this Prouince.

We haue said elsewhere, That the King of Persia had offered conditions of peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his aduantage, seeing that he yeelded himselfe the Turks tributarie, in regard of certaine lands which he had conquered from them. Now the Visier Nassuf General of the armie against the Persian, brings his Embassador to Constantinople, to conclude this peace. A Persian Em- stantinople, whither most of the Bassas of the Port went to salute him, and then returned. But the grand Visier stayd there two days; on the third he past ouer to Constantinople, where he was entertained by the water side by all the Bassa's which accompanied him; an infinit number of Ianizaries going before with their Pieces, and some of them in armour, after whome followed their Aga on horseback; then came a great number of Iamoglans, and the Emirs or kindred of Mahomet with their greene Turbants, with many blinde men shouting aloud: these holy men carried the banner (as they say) of Mahomet, and the people standing by, kissed it with great deuotion as they past: after them came the Chaoux on horseback, the Bassa's, then the chiefe Mufti, and last of all Nassuf Bassa himselfe: after C whom followed the Treasure which hee brought with him for the Emperour, being two hundred thirtie foure Moyles loden with gold and siluer. The Visier as he past by the Sultans window, bowed himselfe verie low vnto him, from whom he had a nod with his head, and so set spurres to his horse and rode away fast, as the manner of the Turkes is when they salute a greater man than themselues, presently to runne or ride away apace. The Visier being come to the Seraill, went in to the Sultan to kisse his hand, where he continued a whole houre, the rest of the Bassa's attending without. There were present at this dayes pompe the Emperors Embassadour, the French, the English, Polonian, Low-Countries, and Venetian; the Persian remaining still at Scudaret. The Graund Visier as hee past by the Emperours Embassadour, put off his hat and saluted him, but not the rest. The same day Tomsho, who had beene D lately made Prince of Moldauia by the Graund Seigniour, sent many Polonians to Constantinople, whom he had taken in the wars. All which (notwithstanding they threw downe their caps and offered to turne Turkes) were put to death. And within few dayes after, the Visier Nassuf sitting in the publique Diuano, had three robes sent him from the Grand Seignior to grace him.

Achmat hauing a will to let the Persian see the magnificence of his Court, went out of Constantinople; and vnder a pretext to go take the aire at his Countrie pallace called Darut Bassa, hee takes occasion at his returne to make a stately entrie at his Imperial Citie. The generall Surueyour being aduertised of his will, caused the wayes from his pallace of Darut vnto the Citie, to be couered with sand; the which containes two French Leagues, or foure The Sultan en- numbers followed after, and after these marcht the Visiers and Bassa's in great pompe: after whom followed the Sultans houshold, that is to say, tenne men leading in their hands tenne goodly horses richly caparisoned, the last of which had the bridle and saddle all couered with pretious stones; the Sultans Targuet was made fast vnto the saddle, and vpon it did hang euen to the ground a great tassel of pearles; and ouer all this, a long horse-cloath or couering for a horse, the which was embroidered so thicke with pearle, as the ground could F not be discerned: after which followed the rest of the Emperors houshold in diuers troups: first, fiftie Ianizaries on foot, euerie one leading dogges in leashes, Mastiffes, or Irish Greyhounds, the goodliest of all were those which the French Embassadour had presented vnto the Sultan. Secondly, the Graund Seigniours footmen called Peiks, Persians by Nation, all well attyred, wearing on their heads bonnets of siluer and gilt, in forme of pots. Thirdly, Turkish Embassador.

The Persian Embassador, for whose sake the Emperor Achmat had made this stately shew, to the end he might carrie backe into his countrie a patterne of the Ottoman state and greatnesse caused to be cast out before his lodging when as the Sultan passed by, [illegible] peeces of siluer, which were scrambled vp by the Archers of his guard, whereof they made good purchase. All these magnificencies, added to those which we haue formerly related in the marriages of the Sultans sister and daughter, with other pompe celebrated in France, Spaine, Naples, and [illegible] Infanta of Spaine, and of the Prince of Spaine with the Ladie Elizabeth of Bourbon the Kings eldest sister, and for the coronation of the Empresse, and the Emperours entrie into Nuremberg may giue vnto this yeare [illegible] the title of magnifique or stately.

The Persian Embassador to the Turke.

Foure dayes after Sultan Achmat entrie into his Imperial citie, the Persian Embassadour had audience, and was receiued to kisse his hands: hee presented vnto his Majestie in the behalfe of the King of Persia his Master, foure hundred balls of silke, a Besonard stone as big as a mans fist, with some others that were lesse; nine bagges of leather full of Turquoises, the which were a foot and an halfe long, and aboue foure fingers broad, a great number of Taperare. The complements being ended, they began to treat seriously of a peace betwixt two great and antient enemies, the Turke and the Persian; the which after some difficulties was concluded vpon these conditions: That the Persian king should pay yearely vnto the Turkish Emperor by way of tribute a quantity of silke to the burthen of two hundred camels: that the King of

A of Persia his sonne should be called Bassa of Tauris, and that the Cadi or Soueraigne Iudge of that towne should be sent from Constantinople. This peace thus concluded to the Turks aduantage, the Persian Embassador returned vnto his master, hauing left most of his traine dead of the Plague at Constantinople. Being arriued at Tauris, the king of Persia seeing this peace to be so dishonourable, and burthensome for him, he caused his Embassadours head to be cut off; and sent backe the Chiaux, who was come from Constantinople to see him sweare the peace. Some write that hee did him some indignities, which made these two great Monarchs returne againe to armes.

The Chimacham put from his place.

The Grand Visier Nassuf, after his returne to Constantinople, to shew his great power and authoritie, procured meanes to haue the Chimacham (who had formerly supplied the place B of the Graund Visier in the absence of Amurath Bassa, and vntill the returne of Nassuf) to be depriued of his Bassaes place, and sent presently ouer vnto Scudarer, vnder pretence of preferring him to a gouernment neere vnto Trebizond in the confines of Turkie, but with an intent to depriue him of his head. The friends of this Chimacham, (who were many and great in Court) seeing him so disgracefully sent away, and doubting Nassuf his purpose, procured leaue from the Graund Seigniour to haue him sent for backe againe, for that hee was an old man, and might from thence forth liue at home in quiet; and for his former seruices a thousand aspersa day allowed him for his entertainement: which Nassuf tooke verie discontentedly.

The Emperour Matthias sends an embassador to Costantinople

During the Persian Embassadours abode at Constantinople, the Emperour Matthias C (successour to Rodulphus his brother) sent an Embassadour to the Sultan, to complaine of the enterprises which were made dayly vpon Transyluania, a Prouince which he said belonged vnto him, as a dependance of his Realme of Hungarie. This Embassadour called Negroni was receiued at the Court, and admitted to kisse the Sultans hand: but his Presents were little esteemed, for that they were of lesse value than those which they had lately receiued from the Persian. His demaunds to haue the Prouince of Transyluania, were grounded vpon an article inserted among those of the peace betwixt the Emperour and Botskay, at that time chosen Prince of Transyluania; that is to say, That Botskay dying without issue male, Transyluania should remaine at the disposition of his Imperiall Maiestie. This article beeing read by Negroni in the Turkes Counsell, whither hee had beene admitted; the Muphti or soue-D raige priest of Mahomets law, answered, That it was contrarie to his law: so the demands of this Embassadour touching Transyluania were reiected; seeing that Botskay had no power from the Sultan (said the Graund Visier) to treat with the Emperour, and to giue him Transyluania after his death. Negroni grounded this gift of Botskay (mentioned in the said article) vpon the eighth article of the peace betwixt the Turke and the Emperour, concluded in the Isle of Dannow, by Amurath Visier, and the Deputies of his Imperiall Maiestie, in these words; That all which had beene granted in the treatie of peace made at Vienna, to Botskay, should be duely and faithfully obserued. Nassuf the Grand Visier replied, That the Bassa Amurath being then Visier, might erre in signing these articles of the peace vpon the Dannow: and at the same in-E stant he shewed forth some other articles, whereas that was not inserted; saying, That the Sultan would faithfully performe those and no others, pressing the Embassadour Negroni to signe them; the which he refused to doe: so as Nassuf vsed some threats to terrifie him; but Negroni replied, That hee was in their power, and that in this case he had rather lose his life, and die gloriously for the good of his masters affaires, than to haue ittaken from him at his returne to Vienna, with shame and infamie, hauing signed those articles. Finally he promised to aduertise his Imperiall Maiestie, and to certifie them of his pleasure: which promise for this time ended the contention.

The malice and falshood of the Turks.

In the beginning of this yeare, Sultan Achmat, after the reception of the Persian Embassadour, and the stately entrie hee made into Constantinople, went to lie at Adrianople, where his Ianizaries and Spahies beganne to mutinie, spurning at their bread and rice F which was giuen them for their dayly entertainement: and beeing demaundeded the reason of this their insolencie; they answered, that no Emperour before him had so carried out his men in the depth of Winter: which answere did much incense Nassuf Bassa. This Visier was in such credit with the Graund Seigniour, as during his abode at Adriathreescore Archers on foot, in the middest of which the Sultan came, attyred in a rich robe of cloath of gold imbroidered with Pearles and Diamonds, his slaues were enricht after the same manner; his Turbant couered with fiue plumes of blacke Herons feathers enricht with great Diamonds, and a chaine of the same stones about the lower part of his Turbant: vpon his little finger he had a Diamond of a large bignesse and estimable price, the which gaue a maruelous great light. He was proudly mounted vpon a goodly horse richly caparisoned Emperour like, the saddle was embroidered with gold, pearle, and Diamonds, the stirrops, of pure gold set with many Diamonds, and from the horse necke did hang a great tassel of pearle, the which were so great, as they were esteemed verie rich and pretious. 4. After the Graund Seignior followed three men on horseback, carrying in their hands, the one his Armour, the other his cloake, and the third his Imperial Turbant, and these were attended on by certaine Esquires and Gentlemen all on horsebacke. 5. Then came the Musicke after the Turkish manner, consisting of threescore men on horseback, which played vpon Phifes, Clerons, and trumpets. 6. There followed an hundred Pages of the Sultans, brauely mounted, and followed by manie Eunuchs, fiftie of which Pages caried euerie one a Faulcon vpon his fist, hauing their heads enricht with Diamonds, and these were followed by thirtie guards of the Port. 7. Fiftie Faulconers and Huntsmen richly attired and wel mounted, foure whereof had either of them before him vpon his saddle bow a Leopard couered with cloath of gold. 8. A great number of other pages, fairer than the pictures of Adonis or Loue, chosen amongst the infants of the Tribute, and vnfortunately appointed for the filthie and vnnatural pleasures of their Master, whose garments after the Turkish manner were pretious, made of rich cloath of gold curled. They were followed by a great troupe of young men richely attyred in cloath, hauing vpon their heads yellow caps pointed in forme of a sugar loafe, and these were ordained to serue the Sultans Pages.

Pages chosen amongst the faiest for the Sultans pleasure.

There were moreouer attending the Sultan in this pompe diuers Beglerbegs, as of Bosna, Buda, Romania, Natolia, and others; euerie companie going distinct, both of horse and foot, with the Bassa's seruants all gallantly attired and wel mounted: and after them followed Nassufs attendants, being fiue hundred in number richly armed: there were also the Kings Friemen, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or officers of gallies with speares in their hands; all that belonged to the Arcenal, the Carters which gouerned the carts going to war, and their Captaines; then the shot-men with their banner, and the Armourers all in armour, with their banner. There were also the banners of the Grand Seignior Mahomet, and of the Grand Visier, euerie one in his order before the Grand Seignior: and after all followed the Capigie's and Officers of his Kitchen. The number of all sorts of attendants in this pompe was so great, as it was esteemed to amount to the number of fortie thousand persons.

The complements being ended, they began to treat seriously of a peace betwixt two great and antient enemies, the Turke and the Persian; the which after some difficulties was concluded vpon these conditions: That the Persian king should pay yearely vnto the Turkish Emperor by way of tribute a quantity of silke to the burthen of two hundred camels: that the King of

This Visier was in such credit with the Graund Seignior, as during his abode at Adria-

Adrianople, hee came three times in person priuately to visite him, who grew so pow- G erfull ouer his masters affections, as hee obtayned a priuiledge, That it might not bee lawfull for any man to speake with the Graund Seigniour priuately, but himselfe. Being returned to Constantinople, there happened a great fire, in which there were fiue hundred houses burnt. The Visier Nassuf comming to see it quenched, and finding some Ianizaries more carefull to breake open lockes, and rifle shoppes, than to doe any good seruice, hee strucke out the braines of one of them with his mace, and brake the arme of another.

It had beene an antient custome in Constantinople, that the owner of the house with all his familie where the fire beganne, should be put to death for their negligence: but it hap- H pening that the Emperours owne Seraill, in the time of Mahomet father to Achmat, being set on fire, Cicala Bassa presented a petition vnto him, that this custome might be abolished, holding it vnjust that other men should be put to death, and the same let passe in the Emperors owne house: whereunto hee yeelded, holding it reasonable. And soone after there happened another great fire, at which the Visier caused many of the Ianizaries to bee hanged; finding them too busie in rifling houses; and he went vp and downe the streets with his scimitar in one hand, and a Ianizaries head in the other, which he had cut off. The Grand Seignior sent Holy Water vnto the Visier, wherein he had dipt a piece of Mahomets garment, the which beeing poured into the fire, the Turkes said, it ceased presently; yet by the report of visible witnesses, it burned foure houres after. The [illegible]nd Visier Nassuf was a cruell enemie to the Ianizaries, of whom he sent sixteene thousand away into Asia, and would not I suffer any moe to be made, but onely Spahies: and ouer such Ianizaries as remained he made his owne seruants to bee Churbagies, and Agaes or Captaines ouer fifties and hundreds; fortyfing himselfe by all the meanes hee could deuise, against the future time, to preuent his sudden ruine; but all this could not preserue him from a shamefull fall, as you shall hereafter heare.

Troubles in the realme of Fez and Moroco.

In the meane time let vs passe vnto Affricke, to obserue the troubles which fell in the Realmes of Fez and Moroco; the quarrels betwixt Prince Xerif Muley Cidan, and the Xerif Muley Achmet, Ben-Abdalla his nephew, and the victories of Cidan against Abdalla. The Family of the Xerifs Princes of Fez and Moroco, tooke its beginning some hundred and foure
The beginning of the Xerifs of Fez & Moroco yeares since, from Mahomet Xerif, borne at Tigumedet in Dara, at this present one of the Pro- K uinces of Moroco: hee was Alfaqui or preacher of Mahomets Law, who seeing the diuisions betwixt the Soueraigne princes of [illegible] Realmes, and that the Portugalls had seised of the chiefe Forts of Moroco, he began with [illegible]e of his sonnes, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahomet, to lay the foundation of a new monarchie, supported by three pillars. That is to say, by a counterfeit pietie and disguised Religion; vpon a godly pretext to make warre against the Portugals Christians which were in Affricke; and vpon a passionate desire to retire the Mahometane Moores which were in their pay, to the end they might by that meanes weaken them, and chase them with more ease out of the territories of Moroco. The King who at that time held the Scepter of Fez (seeing nothing but the outside of the Xerifs designes) suffered his three L sonnes to display their standard against the Christian Portugals in the Realme of Moroco: Innouations and nouelties are commonly pleasing to the common people. At this beginning, The children of the Xerif grow potent. these three leaders were followed by a great number of souldiers; they vanquished in many encounters, and the bruit of their new victories flying into the Realme of Moroco, retired the Moores from the Portugals seruice, whome they defeated soone after, with their Commaunder Lopes Bariga. True it is, that it was to their losse; for Abdalla the eldest of these three brethren lost his life in this combat. But they seised vpon the great towne of Taradente in the prouince of Sus, and of the prouinces of Herra, Ideuaca, Vbideuaca, Cus, Guzule, and in a manner of the whole country betwixt Moroco and mount Atlas, settling their principalitie in Taradente, whereas the Xerif their father carried the name of the Gouernour of the M prouince of Sus.

They kill the king of Moroco The King of Moroco fearing the greatnesse of these new Conquerours, dissembled the desire he had to bring them vnder, assuring himselfe that time would present him some good occasion: so suffering them to enter into Moroco: but they preuented him, they tooke away creet simplicitie suffered them to take armes, and by that means to open the way to a great fortune, he saw a far off the tempest of these vniust spoilers to fall vpon Moroco and other places. The feare of the like calamitie did much afflict his minde: but the Xerifs entertained this idle Prince with faire shewes; they abused his bountie, and with the fourth part of the rich spoiles which they had taken in so many townes and prouinces, they lull his distrust asleepe: moreouer, they send him the tribute due for the realme of Moroco. Hamet takes vpon him the name of King of Moroco; Mahomet that of king of Sus, in the towne of Taradente; and by a good intelligence betwixt them, they make themselues fearefull to all those countries; so as they haue nothing more to feare, than the threats and vengeance of heauen. They then began B to contemne the king of Fez, and plainly to denie the tribute of Moroco; pretending for their reason, that they were issued from the line of Mahomet. This contempt made the king of Fez to The King of Fez besiegeth Moroco, and is defeated. open his eyes; he finds the faults past, by the interest of the present: he sees the Xerifs had abused the libertie which hee had giuen them: whereupon hee went to field with an armie of 18000 men, and planted his siege before Moroco; but as his enemies partie was stronger than his, so he was chased away, and his army defeated at the passage of a riuer. Thus the Xerifs became peaceable possessours of Moroco. The peace of the countrey made these men idle, and idlenesse drew the two brethren into quarrell; they mustred vp their forces and came to fight, Quarrels betwixt the Xerifs, and the eldest taken by his brother.

where after two bloudie battels, Mahomet being victor, he tooke his eldest brother Hamet, de-C priued him of his realme and libertie, and made him end his daies miserably in prison. Thus God doth punish the vnjust spoiler of another mans good: we shall see in their posteritie the continuance of the same quarrell.

Mahomet settled soueraigne in Moroco by bloud and fratricide, as monstrous in ambition The Xerif assaults the king of Fez.
as in crueltie, hee turned the same armes wherewith hee had beaten and vanquished his eldest brother, against the King of Fez (whose improuidence had suffered Mahomet and his brethren to take armes, vnder the deceitfull title and pretence of making warre against the Christian Portugals) he assaulted him with great forces, vanquished him, tooke him prisoner, and depriued him both of Realme and life. Thus the Xerifs in the person of this Mahomet became Soueraigne princes of Fez and Moroco. The victory so happily gotten of so many nations, made him fearefull; but by his crueltie hee drew vpon his descendents the just judgement of him
D who punisheth the excesse and enormitie of crimes vnto the fourth generation. His posteritie Cidan and Kequi brethren expell one another. was miserable, the vnjust desire of raigne (one ruining another) entertained the brethren in perpetuall discord. For Cidan now king of Fez and Moroco, was lately expelled by his brother Kequi; but afterwards Fortune changing her inconstant fauour, Kequi was pursued by Cidan, defeated, and forced in the yeare 1610 to saue his life in Algarbe in Portugall. Abdalla the sonne of Kequi seeing his fathers affaires thus desolate, retires himselfe towards the mountaines in the prouince of Sus: where finding opportunitie to annoy his vncle Cidan, he made daily incursions vpon his territories, with some troups of Arabians who had ioined with him being 200 horse and 200 foot. But finding this to be a long course to attain vnto the conquest of the realme from whence he had been expelled, he bethought himselfe that some certaine
E counterfeit fictions in Religion, had in former times brought in his grandfather, and made him A prophesie inuented by Kequi, and preached by religious Turkes. absolute lord of a great countrey; wherefore he made vse of a prophesie forged in his ambitious spirit: and to worke an impression in the peoples minds (easie to be moued with a passion of religion) he sent certaine religious Mahometans throught the country, with a shew of holy simplicitie, who went preaching from place to place, That one Falquere a man of holy life, had giuen vnto a sonne of his a Drumme of an admirable power and vertue, commanding him expressely, to keepe it carefully, vntill that a prince called Abdalla should come into Moroco, beeing expelled by the injustice of his owne bloud: and that then hee should beat this Drumme, and that the people at the sound thereof might go to the war with all safetie; that it should be helpfull to them, giue peace vnto the Realme, and settle all the cu-
F stomes and antient lawes to their common content. Thus they preached this prophesie, the which they said was now accomplished, seeing that this propheticall Drum had been found, that Abdalla the eldest prince of the house of the Xerifs had caused it to be beaten, exhorting all men to follow the war for the common good of the countrey.

These vanities being preached by these ignorant and malicious religious Turkes, increased the number of Abaallaes partie: whereof Cydan beeing aduertited, hee sent a great armie against him into the prouince of Sus, vnder the command of Alcas Elmye, to hinder the progresse of his designes: But Abdalla finding these forces to approch, retired himselfe towards the [illegible]straines, from whence he might charge the enemies armie; the which he did so happily [illegible]daies he cut off fiue thousand of his men. This successe did so aduance his affaires, [illegible]es encreased daily, so as Cydan was forced to go with new forces to fight with him, the which was the cause of his ruine: for at this time hee was inuested, and notwithstanding the good successe of his false propheſies, lightly grounded vpon the sound of a Drumme, hee was defeated and slaine in this yeare one thous[illegible] six hundred and twelue.

Goterdus, discoursing of this miraculous King of Mauritania, whome hee calles Muley Hamet, writeth that he was charmed with deuilish incantations, and freed from all outward force, carrying himselfe for a Diuine Prophet: That with one hundred and eightie horse, and two hundred foot, hee went to make head against Cydan King of Moroco, hauing fortie thousand men: That his souldiers (who were so few in number) beeing readie to flie, hee persuaded them with a cunning speech to prepare to fight: That comming neere to Cydans campe, they might see a great armie of enemies fighting against them, in which there were fiue thousand of Cydans armie ouerthrowne, and the rest put to flight, and yet Hamet had not aduanced with his troupes. That within few dayes after, comming with his troupes tyred to a riuer side, hee [illegible]anded them not to drinke nor wash in that riuer, which if they did they would die: but some neglecting his command, thinking to quench their thirst, dyed suddenly. Hee tooke many places in those mountainous Regions, which no man had formerly subdued; his forces encreasing dayly, hauing fiue and twenty thousand men, and vowing to go against the Christians, more came vnto him: so as he went against Cydan with a good armie, who likewise attended him. Hamet persuaded his souldiers that no shot could hurt them; so as they assaulted Cydans campe with such furie, as within lesse than an houres space they had slaine aboue six thousand men, and put the rest to flight. They write that Hamet lost not aboue foure or fiue, and that such as were strucke with any bullet, shewed markes but no wounds; and that the great ordnance either shot ouer them, or the pouder vented out at the touch-hole, and wrought no effect. Cydan hauing lost his brother in the fight, fled with all his treasure, to recouer new forces, and in the meane time Hamet made him[illegible]master of the whole countrey. There were certaine Hollanders admitted vnto him, wh[illegible]ey found sitting vpon a carpet made of the barke of trees, hauing a white shirt, and a long gannent vpon it, a red cap on his head, bare thighs, and red shooes, a bag about his necke, and in it hee hid his Alcaron, a short crooked sword and a dagger hanging by him. Beeing saluted by the Hollanders, hee willed them to sit downe by him, telling them that hee was sent from heauen, to purge the World from euill, and to prepare the Law of God; to expell Cydan out of his Kingdome, and to restore peace vnto the World: wherefore hee aduised them not to haue any commerce with Cydan, nor to assist him in any sort. They obserued many markes vpon his bodie, hee had one blew tooth, all the rest beeing white, haire vpon either shoulder, a red circle in the palme of his right hand, and the proportion of a spurre vpon his right foot. Hauing gotten some victories against Cydan, and taken the towne of Moroco, in the end his deuillish art failing him, hee was slaine as you haue heard. Such were the affaires of Affricke, in the Realmes of Fez and Moroco.

A great drought & sterility at Algier

But in Algier a wonderfull drought had caused cruell combustions; it had so deuoured the fruits of the earth before their maturitie, as there followed a wonderfull famine throughout the whole land. The Turkes attributed the cause of their miserie sometimes to their sins; then to the comming of the Moores, who had beene expelled out of Spaine, as a pernicious vermine; and sometimes to the licentiousnesse of Christians, which liued in those places. Wherefore in the beginning of May this yeare, the Iudge of the towne ordained, That all the Turkes should make their deuout prayers to Mahomet their Prophet to obtaine raine, so necessarie in that countrey, that the Moores should depart the towne within three daies vpon paine

A paine of death; and that all the Christians, as wel free as bond-slaues, should cause their heads and their beards to bee shaued, this was speedily executed; for the Turks decrees require a prompt obedience. But the miserable Moores which could not get out of Algier within their three dayes prefixed, detained either by sickneſſe, or some other impediment, were all cut in pieces. For thirteene daies, there was nothing seene within the towne but processions of Turkes without Turbants, crying and howling after their manner to obtaine raine from their false Prophet: but he which commands Soueraignte ouer times, from whose hand proceed faire weather and raine, and which makes the earth fruitfull, held the pipes of heauen yet stopped, to open them at more religious and holy vowes than the superstitious clamours of these Infidels. For Bernard Murroy, of the Order of the Redemption of captiues, hearing that

B the Turkes meant to reuenge their miseries vpon them, and to ruine a little Chappell which the Christian slaues had in the prison, for the pious exercises of their Religion, obtained (by the meanes of Bins Consull of the French in Algier) permission from the Douan, or Turkish Iudge, to make processions, and to pray vnto God to send them the deaw of Heauen, which was so necessarie for them. All the Christian slaues which were prisoners, continued their deuotions for the space of fiue dayes: but on the fourth day beeing the eighth of May, there fell such aboundance of raine vpon Algier, as these poore Christians seeing their praiers heard in the middest of the enemies of their faith, gaue infinit thanks vnto God for his great mercie and grace.

Processions of the Turkes.

The deuout praiers of the Christians obtaine raine.

These miserable Christian slaues were still detayned in yrons and cruell seruitude,

C by this accident. This Murroy of the Order of the Redemption of captiues, accompanied with two others of the same Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirtie and six: but when hee was readie to embarque them, their euill fortune would haue it, that the gallies of Genoa running along that coast, landed some men neere vnto Algier, where they tooke the Bassaes sonne of that Towne, with many other Turkes, and amongst this number a virgine of Algier, of a verie noble Familie, and of as rare a beautie, for the miserie of these slaues: for that when as the Bassaes sonne and the others were redeemed by a Frigot which the father had sent, the faire Algerian virgine was still detayned by a Captaine of the Genowayes, who had retyred to Caluy an Iland adioyning, there to satisfie his desires with more ease, vpn the fraile and fading perfection of D this faire slaue, which had depriued him of his libertie. In the meane time the Bassa of Algier seeing his sonne returned with the other Turkes, and not the Algerian virgine, commanded that the hundred thirtie and six slaues should be put againe into yrons, with the three religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine beautie, or rather the passion of this Genoways, who holds the possession so deare, makes a great number of Christian soules to suffer by insupportable seruitude, howsoeuer they of his Nation (flattering his disordered lust) say that his desire to win her to God, and to make her a Christian, caused him to keepe her so carefully.

These suffered in Algier the losse of their libertie: But a Capuchen Frier, a Florentine by Nation, endured at Tunes the losse of his life, by the crueltie of the Moores chafed out

E of Spaine, and retyred into those Countries. This religious man beeing a slaue among the Turkes, attended daily from Florence, or from some other place, money to redeeme his libertie: but it happened one day disputing in a Barbers house with a Morisque, concerning Christian Religion; the zeale of his faith transported him so farre, as to say among diuers Turkes, That his religion was better than that of Mahomets. These wordes tooke crimonously in that place, were reported by the Morisques to the Cadi or Iudge of the towne, whome they prest with such horrible clamors and cries, as he pronounced sentence of death against this Capuchen. Hee was deliuered vnto them, and they stripped him naked, leading him with infamie through Tunes, some spitting in his face, others casting durt at him, and so they led him out of the Towne, where they tyed him vnto a post, and

F they beeing cruelly incensed by a speech which a Morrabour or religious Turke said vnto them, That he among them that gaue him not one blow with a stone, should be no good Turke; they stoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his bodie, and threw the ashes into the winde.

An enterprise of foure slaues.

The martyrdome of this Capuchen, was followed by the constant confession (amidst the violence of torments) of a penitent Renegado, a Florentine by nation, and captaine of the chiefe gallie of Chio; foure Frenchmen beeing slaues in the Island of Chio, in the patron or chiefe gallie, belonging to the Bey or Gouernour of the Island, they resolued to recouer their libertie with the hazard of their liues, to returne into France, and carrie into some port of Christendom the gallie, being the best appointed in the whole hauen. They drew vnto their partie the Captaine which commanded, beeing a Florentine Renegado. Their enterprise should haue beene executed when as they should goe to land to cut wood. But whether that the scribe were trecherous to his companions, or transported with some rash indiscretion; beeing on land, hee spake these words aloud, the which ouerthrew both the designe, and them that proiected it; Hoe, we shall returne into Christendome. A Turke which was neere, taking hold of these words, reported them vnto the Patron; who presently layed hold vpon the Scribe, and drew from him the confession of all the enterprise. Hee presently sends an hundred men towards the gallie, to seise vpon the foure French slaues and the Captaine. But these fiue made such a generous resistance, as if the other slaues, who were for the most part Moldauians, or of the Prouinces which border vpon the blacke sea, had had the courage to fight for their libertie, without doubt the Frenchmens enterprise had succeeded happily. But what could fiue men do against an hundred? yet they slew fifteene, and wounded many: the foure Frenchmen were all slaine, and the Florentine Captaine was taken aliue, and reserued to the rigour of a cruell death. The Vnited Estates send an Embassador to Constantinople.

A little before, the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, and Count Maurice seeing the losses which the ships of Holland suffered in the Mediterranean sea, many of them beeing taken by the Turkish gallies, and a great number of their men made slaues: to the end they might be freed from that danger, and haue a safe passage for their ships, and procure libertie for their captiues, they resolued to make a league with the Turke. Wherefore they sent Cornelius Haga to Constantinople: who not onely willingly accepted of that Embassie, but performed it with such discretion, as hee purchased great credit and commendation to himselfe, and much profit to the Prouinces. He had resolued at first to passe through Hungary, but he found so many crosses and obstacles, by those that were Creatures to the Pope and Spaniard, as hee was forced to turne out of the way, and fetch a great circuit. First of all, he fell into the hands of the Archduke Ferdinand, who caused him to be examined, and admonished to desist from his purpose: After which hee was tost at sea, and in the end hauing surmounted all dangers, hee recouered Constantinople, the first of May. Hee had expresse charge from the Vnited Estates to labour for three things. The first was, to treat of the deliuerance of the Hollanders that were slaues. The second, to make a league with the Turke. And the third, to obtaine from him a free nauigation for the Hollanders, throughout all the seas and ports of his Empire.

This Embassadour was brought to kisse the Sultans hands, and was fauorably receiued: he presented vnto his Maiestie in the name of the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, his letters of Embassie, with the Presents which follow: Three birds of Paradise of rare and precious plumes, wonderful goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound sterling: two vessels of Christall wonderfull rich and beautifull: foure other vessels made of fishes bones, whereas the art seemed miraculous in the grauing: fortie pieces of cloth of gold of diuers colours; fiue pieces of silke, fiue of damaske, fiue of silke watered, and fiue plaine: A staffe of an Elephants tooth grauen with admirable industry. A Parrat shut in a cage of Christall, so artificially done, as no man could discerne the entrie: and many faire and rich table-clothes of Holland cloth, most part powdred with flowers to the life, and wrought in their liuely colours. The which the Sultan did accept with admiration. All these things shew sufficiently, That the Estates from the beginning or soone after haue raised handy-workes as well as traffique and nauigation to the highest point of perfection.

the vnited Prouinces of the Low-Countries, by the which Achmat promised to cause to be set at libertie, all the Hollanders that were detayned slaues within his Empire: That the traffique should bee free for the Hollanders shippes throughout all his seas and hauens: and moreouer he granted, That the Estates should haue an Embassadour residing at his port. This alliance with the Turke, for the which they haue so often, and with little reason blamed the French, hath beene affected and sought by the English and Spaniards, as wee haue said elsewhere; and now by the Hollanders, whose Estates proceed in all their affaires with such weight and measure, as it seemes they doe nothing but with great reason, and to good purpose.

The Morisques chase the Iewes out of Pera.

About the end of this yeare, the Iewes whose long slauerie throughout the World reproacheth their wretched and miserable obstinacie, receiued at Pera neere Constantinople the weight of a furious tempest which fell vpon them, stirred vp against them by the malice of the Morisques Granadines chased out of Spaine, and retired into the Leuant. These hauing by Presents wonne the fauour of the Cadi, or Iudge of the place, who was a Negro newly setled in that charge by the Graund Visier Nassuf; they obtayned power from him to thrust all the Iewes out of Pera, and to ruine their Synagogues. This power they executed with all violence: And yet these miserable Iewes durst not make their complaints vnto the Magistrate, except one of their sect which dwelt in the Isle of Chio, who being then at Constantinople, and supposing hee had more credit than the rest, went to complaine to this Cadi Negro, who presently caused to be giuen vnto him fiue hundred blowes with a cudgell, in stead of doing him justice; so dangerous a thing it is to haue to doe with such vnjust Magistrates.

The practises of the Morisques against the Christians of Pera.

The insolencies of the Morisques, transported them further: for after they had expelled the Iewes out of their dwellings, they threatned to doe vnto the Christians at Pera, as much as had beene done vnto them in Spaine: and they bragged, That they would seise vpon their Churches, and especially of that of the Franciscan Friers, the which was reasonable faire for the place. But the French Embassadour, hauing made his complaint to the chiefe Visier, hee prohibited them to make any attempt against the Christians, vpon paine of rigorous punishment. This prohibition staied their furie; but they did not forbeare in all other occasions to shew the cruell hatred they owe vnto Christians: so as through all the Leuant, in all encounters where they came, they doe a thousand times more mischiefe than the Turkes themselues.

At the same time the Sultan Achmat had drawne together a mightie armie to go into Transyluania; hee caused it to campe in tents neere vnto Constantinople, about his pallace called Darut Bassa, whither the people of Constantinople went to walke, and to see his forces: within few daies after, hee went to Adrianople; meaning from thence to proceed in his voyage, carrying with him all the chiefe men of his port, except the Bassa of the sea, or Admirall, who remained at Constantinople, to haue a care of the citie. And for the greater safety thereof, this Bassa caused an edict to be published, That no man should go out of his house, nor keepe any light in it after the ordinarie crie, which is made an houre within night, when as the Talilmans crying from the tops of their Mosques, inuite the people to make the Sala, or prayer. After the publication of this ordinance, hee sent certaine Chaoux to entreat all the Embassadours residing at the Port, not to suffer their people to goe out by night, to the end that their libertie might not serue as a dangerous example to others. But notwithstanding all the Bassaes entreaties and prohibitions, three Englishmen of the Embassadors traine, went out by night into the street, where they were met by the Prouost of Pera, who tooke them, and presently (without respect of the qualitie) caused either of them to haue an hundred and fiftie blows with a cudgel, and then committed them to prison, the dores whereof are neuer opened but with a siluer key: so strictly do they obserue in Turkie the orders of the Princes Lieutenants, without exception of persons.

A question for the Patriarchship of Constantinople.

About the end of the yeare, the Patriarch of Constantinople (by reason of diuers complaints made against him, was depriued by the Grand Visier, and one Cyrillus, Patriarch of Alexandria, (a learned and religious Bishop) was (much against his will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all such as had wrought his ouer-throw;

throw, but he himselfe was banished into the Isle of Rhodes. In his passage, the Barke where- G in he went was cast vpon Mytilene, in which place he renounced all right and claime to the Patriarchship before the Bishop of that place, and resigned it to the Bishop of Patras: whereupon the Bish[op] came from Patras, to Constantinople, and laboured with the Visier Nassuf for the place: w[hich] [o] pay him fifteene thousand Chequines (which is ten thousand more than [th]e [pa]y) made him a Grant thereof: which Cyrillus the late elected Patriarch vnderstanding, he came with all the Grecians to expostulate the businesse with the Grand Visier: Who answered, That he was to do what he could for the Emperors profit, and nothing against it; wherefore if they would giue so much as the oth[er] had promised, Cyrillus should continue in the place. Which the people were very willi[ng] to performe; but Cyrillus refused it, and so the other was made Patriarch: who presently sen[t] for the old H Patriarch to come from Rhodes to make peace with him, for that they held not his excommunication just, being not depriued by a Councell, but onely by the King. About the same time, Nassuf the Grand Visier sent for the foure Embassadors, of England, France, Venice, and the States of the Low-Countries; and the reason why he sent for them was, to raise their custome one in the hundred more than the Merchants had formerly payd.

The enterprise of the Great Duke of Tuscanie vpon Agliman.

Whilest that the Sultan Achmats armie drew neere to Transyluania, and fortified the places which he held in those Countries, Cosmo de Medicis Great Duke of Tuscanie bent his generous designes against the Fort of Agliman in Caramania, in old time called Cilicia, a Prouince which in the writings of Antients hath beene honoured with two famous Cities, that is to say, Tharsis the countrey of Saint Paul, and Seleucia, the Fort and Port whereof is called Agliman, a hauen which in old time hath contained within it's bosome the feareful for- I ces of the Pyrats of those dayes: from thence in former times hath come forth a powerfull armie of pyrats with a thousand saile, so proudly rigged, as many of them had their sailes of purple, the tackling of gold thred, and the oares garnished with siluer, markes of the spoiles of aboue foure hundred cities ruined by those pyrats, who stroke a terror euen to the Romans, and forced them, to auoid their furie, to set to sea that great fleet whereof Pompey the Great was General.

the Great Duke to studie to haue his reuenge for this affront; and his desire to abate the pride K this present yeare 1613, hee armed [fo]ur Gallies vnder the command of the Admiral Inghirami, the which he manned with six co[m]panies of foot commanded by Iulio de Conty, called Montano, General at land, besides fortie K[n]ights of the Order of S. Stephen, and a good number of gentlemen aduenturers, among the which was Don Petro de Medicis. This fleet parted from Ligorne, and came to Ciuita Vecchia: in the beginning of Aprill they tooke in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, which attended them, and would be partakers in the enterprise; the which were, the Earle of Candale, eldest sonne to the Duke of Espernon, Cipierre, Themines, De Vic, Monterrault, De la Tour, and his brother Boissiere, Villandre, Vernegue, Du Plessis, De la Motte magnus, Auenes, Del Tour, Sainct Cyre, Monplaisir, and Loyres. L

About mid Aprill the gallies landed in the night neere vnto a little towne in Asia the Lesse, [They] land at [Ge]ronda. called Ieronda, held for that Geronda of the Antients: but their discent was fruitlesse, they found it desart by the flight of the Inhabitants, who had preuented all surprises. They returned again to their gallies, and sailing towards the East, they encountred three Vessels like vnto their Caramoussals, the which they set vpon and tooke: and about the fifteenth of May, hauing scoured the Leuant seas, they resolued to attempt Agliman. Vpon the way they tooke a stood there were two Gallies of Cyprus in the Port, that the place was well furnished with all things necessarie, and guarded without by a good number of horsemen, and that within few dayes after, one of the said gallies should come out of the port of Agliman, and go to the M Island of Pappadula, to fetch a new mast. Inghirami thought to preuent it, carrying his whole fleet thither, the which he layd close in the Island to surprise the Turkish Galley; but it hauing discouered his fleet, put out to sea, and with speed returned to the Port of Agliman;

to

A to giue the alarme vnto the Countrey. Notwithstanding the Christians resolued to assault it, they went with their fleet to the port Caualier, twelue miles from Agliman, from whence they sent a long boat to discouer: the which brings them word that the whole countrey was in armes. These newes might well haue daunted the courages of some that had been leese generous; yet they passe on and about three of the clocke in the morning they came neere the shore, being couered with the silence of the night, so as before six of the clock they had made their landing about a mile and a halfe from the port. The Seignior of Montano and the Earle of Candale with some few choise men landed first, to discouer: a mile from the shore they encountered the Turkish horsemen, yet notwithstanding Montano commanded they should finish their landing, leaning twentie men for the guard of euery gallie.

The Christian land at Agliman.

The description of Agliman.

B This fort of Agliman is seated vpon a little pleasant hill, which lookes towards the South:
It extends from the hill vnto the sea shore: the forme is ouall; that part which is next to the Sea is altogether Meridionall, and the other which riseth vpon the top of the hill, lookes towards the North. The wals are built of good stone and lime, the which are fiue faddome high, and one broad. Within there was a wall drawne from the East to the West, which diuides it into two vnequall parts, the which they enter by a port set in the midst. The circuite of the wall is fortified with eight towers, whereof fiue be whole, and three are but halfe towers: those which be whole are of a square forme, and haue fiue faddome in breadth on either side: the halfe towers haue the same greatnesse on the one side, and halfe as much on the other; their heigth exceedes not the wall, vnlesse it bee that which is built on the C top of the hill, which is raised about eight foot aboue the wall. Within the place were aboue three hundred fighting men; with store of victuals, munitions for warre, and many pieces of ordnance: without, there were an hundred horse scouring vp and downe for the guard of the place: and within the port there were two gallies, a Caramoussall, and a Greeke Brigandine, with some hundred and fiftie fighting men. The order of the combat was diuided after this manner, by the Seignior Montano Generall at land: for the principall port, and that of the retrear, he sent two companies of foot, which were those of the Admirals gallie, of the captains gallie, and of S. Stephen, with the petards, all vnder the charge of the Earle of Candale, who leading this forward, discouered a Corps de gard of Turkes, horse and foot together: whereof hee presently aduertised the Generall, sending him word that hee would march on towards the D fort, and if the Turks came to charge him, he would cut them all in pieces. Many aduised him to returne to the gallies: but Montano allowed the resolution of the Earle of Candale, who past on without charge vntill hee came within 120 paces of the wall, where hee was charged before by the musket shot of the fort, behind by the gallies, and in flanke by them of the mountaine, with such horrible howling and crying out, as the mariners which carried the Pe-tards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the ground, and fled away. The Baron of Mont terault, and Tiel, a souldier of Languezu tooke them vp. They continued their way vntill they came within fifteene paces of the walls, when as twentie Turks sallied forth with a shew to make head against the Earle of Candales troupes: but seeing themselues too weake, they fled presently againe backe to the towne. The Earle aduanced to enter with E them, but the port was so soone shut as they were in: wherefore they must of force set the Petard to worke, But whilest they were making it fast vnto the gate, there fell a showre of great stones vpon the troupe, wherewith Don Pedro de Medicis (who would needs be present) was ouerthrowne and halfe slaine; Callonge, Mont-terault, La Tour, Dauanes, and Deltour had taken vpon them the charge of the Petard, euerie one carrying a part, to put it speedily in execution.

The order giuen to assault the fort.

The Turkes come from their gallies to charge the Christians.

Whilest they were thus busied to force the Port, the Sergeant Maior came vnto the Earle of Candale and told him, that there was a troupe of three hundred muskitiers come to charge him: these were two Beyes which came out of the gallies with their troups, by reason of the bad guard which the two companies that Montano had left to hinder their landing, had F kept. The Earle of Candale had left part of his troupe with the Petard, and turned head with the rest against these Beyes to charge them: but they had no meaning to fight, but onely to make a shew, and seeing they should be forced if they staied longer, they tooke their way towards the mountaine, and in their retreat made many shot. The Christians pursued them not,

The squadron of the knights of S. Stephen, commanded by the Commissarie Lenzoni, and the companie of the gallies of S. Magdalen, with two ladders were to assault the high tower. The companie of the Admi[illegible]lie with one ladder, had charge to force the port of the retreat; and the co[illegible] of S. Iean was to fight with the gallies and vessels in the hauen: all these [illegible] by the Generall Montano, and by Captaine Alexander of Tarentum, Sargeant Major) marched in order towards the fort. But the Petard hauing effected as we haue said, the Earle of Candale entered first with all his troup, and suddenly ran vnto the port of the retreat, there to apply a petard, the which also very fortunatly mad[illegible]. The Turkes amazed at the noise and forcing of their gates, fled vnto their walls, [illegible]ing into their towers, and others into the barricadoes which they had made in the street. At the same instant they planted two ladders on the lower part of the towne somewhat neere adjoyning to the sea, whereof one was broken with the losse of them that were vpon it: by the other (notwithstanding that the Turks horsemen charged them behind) a good number of Christians got vp to the wals, making their way by their armes, whilest that the rest put the Turks to rout: hauing taken their Cornet, they forced the rest for to flie vnto the mountaines. The squadron of Knights with the companie of the gallie of Saint Marie, hauing had a longer way to march, came not to the tower vpon the hill, vntill that aft[illegible] the petards had wrought their effects: so as the Turkes being retired thither, they four[illegible]ry great resistance, besides the attempts of the enemies horse which charged them bem[illegible]; thrice they planted their ladders against the wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commissarie Lenzoni, hauing performed as much as a braue and resolute man could doe in that extremitie, resolued to leaue that place, and go vnto some other where he might be more necessarie: but being the last to make the retreat, he was shot through with two musket bullets, and suddenly slaine. The companie of the gallie of S. Iohn, vanquished the two gallies in the port, whereof Inghirami the Admirall at sea went to take possession as soone as they had giuen him a signe, hauing the other two vessels at libertie. H I

Within the fort in the towers, and at the barricadoes, the combat was hot and dangerous, the Turkes had despaire and the aduantage of the place on their sides. The Christians thrust on by their valour and constant resolution, prest them on all sides; there was nothing to be seene but bloud, wounded or dead m[illegible]: but much more of the Turks side than of the Christians. In the end, after a combat c[illegible]e houres, the Turks fainted, some were taken, many were slaine, and the Christians obtai[illegible]bsolute victorie: But as it could not be made without losse of their enemies, who made[illegible]cat resistance: so there were fiue and fiftie Christians wounded, of which number De Vic a French Gentleman was one, who had a musket shot through his thigh, going to charge a troupe of Turks which were retired into a tower: and some Gentlemen were slain; among the which was yong Boissierre, a French man, whose valour in this action made them that saw him fight so generously, conceiue a certaine hope, that hee would haue prooued a valiant captaine, if heauen had lent him longer life. The sorrow for his death was generall; as well among the Italian troups, as among those of his owne Nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other braue French Gentlemen were also slaine. The dead and the wounded were carried vnto their gallies: they emptied the Fort of all the artillerie, munition for warre, and victuals; the trophie of fortie Florentines heads was beaten downe, and all the houses set on fire. Agliman beeing thus ruined, they shipped their bootie, with three hundred and fiftie Turkish slaues, hauing freed about two hundred and fortie Christians which were in yrons. The two Turkish gallies were drawne out of the Port, and carried away with eight other vessels. In this triumph as the Admirall Inghirami bent his course towards Ligorne; vpon the way a Turkish Caramousall came into the middest of the fleet, as into a toyle: It prepared to defend it selfe, the patrons gallie inuested it, but not without losse; for the Turkes made so great resistance, as there were aboue foure score Christians hurt or slaine; the Earle of Candale fighting alone at the prow of the gallie, by the permission of the Generall. But this Caromousall beeing taken, and the Florentine mariners entered, it spli[illegible]nd sunke suddenly. The great Dukes gallies encountered some other smaller J K L M

A smaller vessels; the which they tooke, and afterwards arriued happily at their port.

The twelfth of August following, Octauio of Arragon Generall of the gallies of Sicilie, by the commandement of the Duke of Ossunna, Viceroy in that Realme, parted from the hauen of Palermo, with eight gallies well armed and manned, to sayle into the Leuant. His first touch was vpon the Island of Cerigo, where he vnderstood that the Admirall Bassa of the sea was gone from Constantinople with thirtie gallies, bending his course to the Island of Negropont, whereas sixtie others attended him in the hauen; and moreouer, that the gallies of Rhodes prepared to goe and ioyne with him, all which Nauall fleet was to fall vpon Soria, against the Turks Rebels. The Voyage of the gallies of Sicilie in the Leuant.

Notwithstanding these news, Octauio continues his course vnto the Island of Nicaria, where he vnderstood by a Greeke vessell, that the Turkish admirall meant to send twelue gallies to Rhodes, to guard certaine vessels of the fleet, which came from Alexandria by the Channell of Samos. True it is, that of twelue which were together when they parted, two were sent by the Bey or Captaine which commanded them, into the Island of Chio, so as there remained but ten together. Octauio resolued to charge these 10, causing his fleet to row that day, and almost [illegible] whole night as secretly as they could, along the shore of the firme land of Natolia, and at the breake of day he arriued at the cape of Coruo, twentie miles from Chio; from whence he sent his long boat to discouer. But in the meane time hee himselfe espied the ten Turkish gallies not far from him; at sight whereof he ordred his gallies for battell, with such diligence, as at Sun rising he was about the enemies gallies, and had inuested them. At his first approch he discharged all his ordnance, and then with his Admirall gallie he joyned with the Turkes gallie which carried the standard; the Spaniards entered, slew and massacred all that made resistance: the combat began at the prow, from whence they went to the poope, where as the Bey or Commander of the ten gallies stood, whom they forced to yeeld. In the meane time the other gallies of Sicilie charged the Turkes so furiously, as they tooke fiue, all great vessels carrying lanthornes; two fled towards the land, hoping to saue themselues, but the Turkes had scarce leasure to leape to land, and to flie into the countrey, abandoning their vessels to the Spaniards, who pursued them; the other three gallies hauing gotten some aduantage escaped by flight: so seuen onely came into the Spaniards power, in the which they had a verie rich bootie, freeing aboue a thousand Christian slaues, which were at the chaine, and by a strange change of fortune, putting into their places the Turks which had inchained them. Among the most remarkable of the prisoners, were the commander of the 10 gallies called Sinan Bey of Grigna in the Island of Cyprus; the Bey of [illegible]lexandria (son to Pial Bassa, who was defeated in the battell of Lepanto, by Don Iohn of Austria) and some Raise or Captaines, and Patrons of gallies. They set vpon ten Turkish gallies.

This Summer the Emperour Matthias being gone to an assembly of the States at Presburg in Hungarie, in the meane time Sigismund Battori, who had beene prince of Transyluania, and so great a terror & scourge vnto the Turks, as he made Sinan Bassa, hauing an armie of one hundred and fiftie thousand men, to flie thrice within ten daies from before him, and would neuer endure the sight of him, hee hauing but fortie thousand men in his armie. But afterwards being the author of his owne misfortunes and miseries, by his inconstant humours, he came and liued [illegible] priuate life at Prague, and there died of an Apoplexie. At the Estates of Presburg they consulted of the fortifying of their Frontier townes, and manning them with good garrisons, knowing the infidelitie of the Turks, and doubting they would not obserue the truce. But there was some question in the assembly, touching the admissions of Germans into their garrisons: for that the Hungarians maintained they had a decree to the contrarie; and yet they could not defend themselues without the assistance of Germanes: but in the end it was concluded, that the Germanes should bee admitted equally with the Hungarians into their garrisons, but all other strange souldiers should bee excluded. The Turkes in the meane time had burnt and spoyled many villages in Hungarie and Transyluania, carried away many Christians captiue, and committed many other actes of hostilitie, so as all men feared a new warre in Hungarie, but by the prouidence of God it was diuerted. For Sultan Achmat marching toward Transyluania with a mightie armie, hearing vpon the way that Bethlem Gabor was acknowledged prince, vnder his protection, hee turned head toward Constantinople Sigismũd Battori prince of Transyluania dies at Prague. The Turks threaten warre in Hungarie. E F not, holding it fitter to returne to the Petard, the which plaied so happily, as it made a breach capable for three men to enter in front.

The squadron of the knights of S. Stephen, commanded by the Commissarie Lorenzo and the companie of the gallies of S. Magdalen, with two ladders were to assault the high tower. The companie of the Admi[ral]lie with one ladder, had charge to force the port [for the] retreat; and the co[mpanie] of the gallie of S. Iean was to fight with the gallies and vessels in the hauen: all these [led] by the Generall Montaro, and by Captaine Alexander of Tarentum, Sargeant Major) marched in order towards the fore-[said] place [for] as we haue said, the Earle of Candale entered first with all his [men] port of the retreat, there to apply [him]selfe, the [rest] Turkes amazed at the noise and fire [of] their towers, and others into the [ha]rbour [in] instant they planted two ladders [of] to the sea, whereof one was broken [by] rowing before the Marquis [of] notwithstanding [the] purpose, when they cut them in pieces, and gaue them vnto [the] sea.

The Turkes retire to their towers and walls.

The Grand Seignior beeing returned to Constantinople after the great Plague, notwithstanding, the Turkes hold a firme opinion of Predestination, and that they shall not die before their appointed time, and that the time of [their] death is written in their foreheads; yet apprehending the infection, by the aduice of [those] about him, hee commanded all the dogges in the Citie of Constantinople, to bee transported vnto Scutarie in Asia (a towne anciently called Chrisopolis) and for the due execution thereof, euerie housholder was to bring in his dogge first to the Cadi (which is the Iudge of the place) and to receiue from him a Tuscarie or ticket for his passage, or else hee was to pay foure Chequines; by which meanes there were transported to the number of fiftie thousand dogges. The reason of his sending them away, was, for that reading the Acts of his father, hee found that thirtie yeares before, he had sent away all the dogges for feare of the infection. The Sultan commanded allowance of bread and flesh to bee carried euerie day to sustaine them, which not sufficing, the inhabitants were much oppressed, and readie to fall into mutinie; but by the aduice of his Muphti, they were at length transported from thence to an Island that was not inhabited, some sixteene miles from Constantinople, where they all perished. Before their sending away, the Grand Seignior propounded to his Muphti, to haue them all slaine: who made answere, That euerie dogge had a soule, and therefore it was not fit to kill them.

The Grand Seignior causes all the dogges in Constantinople to be transported.

The care of the Turkes to win men to their Religion.

The Turkes are wonderfull glad when they winne any one to their Religion, and seeke by all meanes to seduce men either by force or by faire persuasion; whereof you may see an assured proofe, by a Iew, who beeing turned Turke, soone after buying of grapes of another Turke, fell at variance with him about the weighing of his grapes: from words they fell to blowes, and the Iew-Turke beat the other, which he endured verie patiently to encourage him as it seemed in his new Religion. Soone after, another Iew came to the Turke who had beene beaten, and demanded of him why he had suffered himselfe to be so abused? Who answered, You shall beat me as much if you will turne Musulman, so zealous they are to winne Prosolites.

A seuere punishment of a drunkard.

This yeare in October, the Turkes obseruing their feasts of Bairan (which is our Easter) the which they obserue twise a yeare; a Turke hauing drunke wine too freely (the drinking whereof is forbidden amongst them, although they loue it well, and drinke in priuate) was apprehended, and carried before the Grand Visier: who seeing the fact verified, inflicted this punishment vpon him, to haue boiling lead powred into his mouth and eares, the which was speedily executed.

Bethlem Gabor as you haue heard was seated quietly in the Principalitie of Transyluania, the Sultan supported him, and had sent Sarder Bassa with an armie against Gabriel Bastori who was then in possession, but weake both of men, money, and friends, hee was not able to make head against them, so as beeing abandoned of his friends, and hated of his subiects, subiects for his tyrannie, he grew into despaire and was slain by his owne souldiers. Whereupon the country yeelding obedience to Gabor, Sarder Bassa retired out of Transyluania with his Turkes. Yet afterwards, some neerely allied to Bastori (desiring to reuenge his death) caused some alterations; and others seeking to get the Prouince from the Emperour, had surprised Hust and other places in his name. The Sultan hearing this, wrote his letters to the noblemen and States of the Prouince. They were not ignorant he said, that since the time that Transyluania yeelded obedience to his predecessors, and him, they had alwaies liued in peace vnder his protection, and had often desired and obtained succour against their enemies: That when as Botscay had been annoied by the Germans, assisting him with great forces, he had shaked off the yoke: That when as Bastori his successour had liued after his owne will, they sent Bethlehem Gabor with complaints to his court by their generall consent, and did easily obtain forces to free the Prouince from tyrannie. He being taken away, now a wished day began to shine, the clouds of tribulation beeing all dispersed: That he had held Bethlem worthy to succeed Bastori, and to enioy that Prouince. Wherefore he had commanded all the noblemen to submit themselues vnto him, and to enjoy a wished peace: That Bethlem had sent to aduertise him of the new practises of the Germans; wherefore he had giuen charge to the Bassaes of Temeswar and Agria, and to the Prince of Valachia to be watchfull to repell all these injuries, admonishing the noblemen to yeeld speedie obedience to Bethlem: to which end hee had sent them those letters, that vpon the sight thereof they might be admonished of their duties; and if the Germans should attempt any thing, they should make resistance vntill the coming of his forces: and following Bethlem in all things, they should acknowledge him for their true and lawfull Prince, and continue constant in their fidelitie, lest they should prouoke his wrath against them, and draw vpon themselues some great miserie: writing much more to the like effect; concluding, That hee had fully purposed and resolued, not to spoyle any one village or any fort in Transyluania, nor to doe any wrong to any man, nor suffer it to be done by any other, but would defend that Prouince from all oppression. Wherefore he would haue the Emperour aduertised, that if he meant to haue the peace inuiolably kept, he should cause the said places of Transyluania to be presently restored vnto the Prince, or signifie his minde vnto him by letters.

The Sultan admonisheth the Transyluanians to obey Bethlem

Of these Rebels of Asia, whereof wee haue made mention, the Gouernour of Sarepta or Sidon in Syria, called Armili or Emir Facardin, he who gaue enterance into his Port to the Florentines, and receiued them in their courses to the Leuant; hearing that the Bassa of Damas, and the Bassa of the sea, with the gallies which he brought from Constantinople, and the threescore which he tooke at Negropont (whereof wee haue made mention) came to fall vpon him with a mightie and fearefull armie, hee left his eldest sonne within Sidon with forces to command there, and in other forts about it, and flying from a furious tempest of enemies, he went to sea with three shippes, to retire himselfe into Europe, with his foure wiues, tenne children, seuentie Turkes, and foureteene thousand pound weight in gold. Hee arriued at Ligorne, and went from thence to Florence, vnder the protection of Cosmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuscanie, whose hands hee kissed, presenting vnto him a Cuttelas verie curiously wrought, and enriched with stone, and two jewels to the great Ducheese, to the value of six thousand crownes. This Turke though he had no faith, yet hee found faith with this Prince of Tuscanie. Cosmo receiued him, defrayed him and all his traine, furnished him with money, whether it were by way of gratification, or that Emir had consumed his owne: and by all kinde of courtesies made this Infidell see what difference there is to flye vnto the protection of a Christian Prince, or to haue recourse vnto a Mohometane. They say that Emir made manie goodly ouertures for the settling of the Christians in Asia: but to attempt it with a good and happie successe, it should be necessarie that most of the Christian Princes would joyne their wils and armes together for the generall good of Christendome. It is true, that the great Duke Ferdinand deceased, and Cosmo his successour had made proofe of their good intentions, by many generous enterprises against the Turke. But one Prince alone cannot doe all.

These things past in the yeare 1613, the end whereof concludes with the fury of terrible tempests in the Mediterranean sea. The tenth of Nouember a fearefull tempest full of lightening, thunder, and furious windes, was the cause of the losse of many gallies and ships in the

A conspiracie against the Visier Nassuf

The grand Visier Nassuf held his credit with the Prince, at whose retu[illegible]rom Adriano- H ple, many Ianizaries (to whom the Visier was verie odious) conspired to kill [illegible]n as hee should enter in at the North gate comming from Adrianople, and had placed themselues there for the effecting of what they had entended: but comming neere vnto the gate, the Sultan (being ignorant of what was entended against the Visier) called for him to speake with him, keeping him by him vntill he was entred into the city, by which means he escaped the pretended practise. Soone after, Nassuf inuited the Sultan to a sumptuous feast, and within few daies after the Emperor feasted [illegible]e Visier; who presuming vpon his great credit, caused all the crosses in the Church of S. Sophia (which is one of the goodliest monuments in Constantinople) to bee throwne downe, and all the Images to be defaced, the which had stood entire euer since the Christians gouernment. I

The King of Persias cruelty against the Armenians.

The yeare before, the King of Persia had put to death 1[illegible]00 Armenians vpon a false suggestion as if they had intended to reconcile themselues to the Pope: that king hating the Papists, and yet suffers diuers Iesuits to liue in his dominons. The English Embassadors chaplein desirous to know the reason of the Persians crueltie, conferred with the Patriarke of the Armenians which resided at Constantinople (for there are two Patriarks, where of the one is vnder the Persian, and the other at Constantinople vnder the Turk) who told him that it was true he had miserably slaine many of their nation by the cunning practises of an Armenian, who had counterfeited letters from the Patriarke of Armenia to the Pope, by which the Patriarke with his whole Church of Armenians, made offer to reconcile themselues to the Church of Rome, and to acknowledge [illegible]pe as their head; intreating the Pope to write to the king of K Persia to giue them leaue to [illegible] freely: which letters the Pope receiuing, he rewarded the messenger bountifully, and [illegible]retur[illegible]res by him to the King of Persia, wherby he entreated him to suffer the Armenians in his [illegible]ou[illegible]ey to vse their consciences freely. The king of Persia hauing receiued these letters, g[illegible] into a great rage, causing many of them to bee put to death; saying, That if they would be obedient to the Pope, he could expect no seruice nor obedience from them: notwithstanding the Papists said that this was done directly by the Patriarke; but the Armenians affirme that it was the practise of a counterfeit rogue. Soone after there arriued 3 Embassadours at Constantinople; the one was a Circassian, the second a Georgian (and this was a Bishop) and the third a Mingrelian, all of them to complaine of the Persians oppression and cruelrie, imploring succours from the graund Seignior for their support. Presently after L them arriued a Persian Embassador, whom the Sultan would not admit to audience, vntill all controuersies were concluded betwixt himselfe and the Emperor, which was then in question, the Sultan hauing sent one Gasparo (sometime a seruant in the English Embassadors house) to treat with the Emperor, by whose means at length all matters were reconciled betwixt them.

1614 The fal of Nassufs fortune.

The yeare 1614 began by the horror of great prodigies; which were seene in diuers parts of Hungarie and Silesia. Ouer the towne of Vienna in Austria, the heauens grew so red and fearefully darkened, as they feared that either the last day was come, or else there would follow some horrible effusion of bloud. But all these signes had no other effect this yeare, than the ruine of the great fortune, and prodigious authoritie of Nassuf Bassa, grand Visier of the Turkish Empire, formerly one of the greatest and most fearful rebels which had carried arms M in Asia against the soueraigne power of their Sultan: but to comprehend more plainely the fall and declining of his fortune, let vs behold him in his beginning and first rising. Hee was the sonne of a Greeke Priest, borne in a little village neere vnto Solonica, and hauing beene taken by the tribute, which the Turkes exact from Christians vpon their miserable children, ta-

A taking one of three; hee was carried verie young to Constantinople, and there sold for three The beginning & progresse of Nassufs fortune chequines or Sultanins (euery one of which is not aboue eight shillings starling) to an Eunuch of the Sultans, who nourished him and bred him vp till hee came to the age of twentie yeares, and afterwards sold him to a Steward of the Sultanaes house, to serue him in his charge: who finding this slaue to haue a spirit capable of greater affaires than the houshold, employed him in the ouersight of the building of a rich and stately Mosque, which the Sultana caused to be erected at her charge: In this place hee gaue such proofe of his wit and judgement, to the Sultanaes content, that soone after shee gaue him the gouernement of her houshold.

The Sultan had a will to employ him in his seruice, and retired him from the Sultanaes B house into his Seraglio, where hee was honoured with the charge of the Capigi Bassa, or Captaine of the Porters or Vshers of the Seraglio; from thence hee was aduanced to the dignitie of the Bassa of Aleppo, and soone after hee was made Gouernour generall of Mesopotamia. The commoditie of his gouernment (frontiring vpon Persia) stirred vp his am- He is made gouernor of Mesopotamia.
bitious thoughts, and his disordinate desire to become soueraigne of that Countrey, and made him to entertaine manie practises with the King of Persia, an antient enemie to his master. The report of his practises came to Constantinople: the Sultan is aduertised, hee knowes the ambitious and stirring spirit of this Nassuf, and findes that hee is verie profitable for his seruice, if hee can by any milde course withdraw him from his disloyalties and intelligences with the Persian: wherefore hee dissembled the knowledge of his treacherous C designes, and to gaine him the more powerfully, he gorged his ambitious appetite with the greatest dignitie of his Empire. After the death of Murath Bassa, he honoured him with the Nassuf made grand Visier and Generall of the armie.
place of Graund Visier, and gaue him all his goods, and in his place made him Generall of the armie against the Persian, with promise to giue him his daughter in marriage. Thus was Nassuf aduanced by his dexteritie, wit, diligence, and trecherie, to the greatest chargesofthe greatest Empire of the World.

He entered into Persia, as Lieutenant Generall of his masters armie, with the which hee He forceth the Persian to a peace.
made so great a spoyle, as hee forced Ka Abbas King of Persia now raigning, to demand a peace; and after that hee had granted him a surceasse of armes, hee brought his Embassador to Constantinople, to conclude this peace to his masters benefit, as we haue formerly obser-D ued. Hee enters in pompe, presents a million of gold vnto his Emperour, is well receiued at the Seraglio, much made of by the Bassaes, but more by the Sultan, who caused him to marry his daughter. Fortune hauing thus aduanced him to the height of greatnesse, not being possible to climbe higher, shee ouerthrowes him, and doth precipitate him to the lowest degrees of miserie. The Sultan feares his spirit, too headstrong by reason of his ambition; hee growes The Sultan resolues to be rid of him, & concludes his ruine jealous of his actions, and about the end of the yere concludes his ruine and death. The commandement is giuen to Bostangi Bassa, that is to say, the Sultans chiefe gardiner, and ouerseer of his Seraglio, and all his houses, one of the goodliest dignities of the court. Nassuf was at that time sicke in his house; Bostangi goes thither to visit him, and to cause him to be strangled, being accompanied onely with 7 or 8 men; for that he would not giue any suspition of the com-E mandement he had receiued from his master. Being come vnto his lodging, he demanded to speake with him, and Nassuf excused himselfe by his seruants, by reason of the discommoditie of his health: but the Bostangi (who would needs execute his commission) replied, that hee could not returne to the Sultan (who had sent him to haue certain newes of his health) before he had seen him, to be the better assured. At this reply Nassuf grew distrustful, & would without all doubt haue been far from thence in some place of Mesopotamia; but beleeuing whatsoeuer happened to him was inuitable, he commanded them to suffer the Bostangi to enter:
who at his first approch entertained him with many complements of courtesie; and hauing demanded some questions of him touching his health, he drew out of his pocket a commandment from the Sultan to Nassuf, to deliuer vnto him the seales of the empire: the which being F presently don, he drew out another commandement vnto him, by the which he was inioyned to send him his head: then Nassuf cryed out aloud, and desired to speake with the Sultan; but the Bostangi answered, that he had no commission to conduct him to the Seraglio, but to cause his life to be taken away presently: vpon this refusall, he intreats him, to giue him leaue
to

to wash himselfe in the next c[illegible]ber, to the end that his soule (said he) should not depart this world in the estate of pollutio[illegible]cording to the Turkes beleefe, who hold the washing of the bodie for a true purifica[illegible] This fauour was also denied him; he saw there was no remedie in his miserie, nor any [illegible]pe of grace. Bostangi Bassaes followers (which were seuen or eight Capigies) beeing co[illegible] take away his life, and enuironing his bed, which was an vndoubted sur[illegible] that hee [illegible]st die; in the end he resolues, and turning himself e vnto these executioners, [illegible]m to doe their duties: whereupon they fell to worke, and casting themselues vpon him, they put a cord about his necke, and sought to strangle him; but seeing that the fatnesse of his repleat bodie would not suffer them to take away his life presently, they cut his throat with a knife. His death could not be displeasi[illegible] to the Christians, seeing that all his designes tended to their ruine: he had perswaded his [illegible]ter to breake the peace with the Emperour, the French King, and the Venetians, promi[illegible] him to make him soueraigne Monarch of the whole world, to the end he might keep his spirit in action, and make himselfe necessarie to his master, and liue more safely in combustions than in a calme; whereas the enuie and malice of his enemies gaue him a thousand furious assaults. Thus Nassuf Bassa ended his dayes and fortune; before Gouernour of Mesopotamia, Generall of an Imperiall army, and Grand Visier of the Turkish Empire; aduanced of these supreme dignities, by the great actions of his mind, but ouerthrown shamefully to his ruine by his boundlesse ambition. Doubtlesse it is a difficult thing for a fauorite that is insolently audacious, to continue long in grace with his Prince; especially when hi[illegible]nrestrained ambition hath once broken the bounds which reason prescribeth to those th[illegible]Fortune aduanceth by the fauour of her blastes; and that hee followes obstinately that pernicious curiositie to know by experience how high Fortune can aduance him: for then the desire to enjoy that which is aboue his condition, blinding the eyes of reason, hee doth precipitate himselfe by his rash and insolent actions, to the lowest steppe of shamefull ruine. The riches of Nassuf were so great and proportionable to his fortune, as after his death they found about two bushels of diamonds and pearles. Doubtlesse this rich and stately spoile deserued to be enioyed by some great Prince. So the Emperour Achmat seised thereon, and applyed it to his Chasna, or Treasurie.

Another discourse of Nassufs death.

This death of Nassuf is related after another manner by one who was then present in Constantinople, the which I haue thought good to set downe as I haue receiued it from him. The Grand Seignior being mu[illegible]discontented with his Visier; whither incensed with such as were neere about him, who both [illegible]d and feared Nassuf, or doubting his great power; hee dissembled his spleene, vntill he m[illegible] finde some opportunitie for reuenge: yet it was not so secretly carried, but Nassuf had d[illegible]red the Sultans discontent, and laboured by great gifts both to the Sultana and others t[illegible]pacifie him, prouiding notwithstanding in the meane time for his owne safetie, sending horsemen dayly ouer into Asia, meaning to passe himselfe when hee had gathered together a sufficient strength. But it fell out on the seuenth day of October, it beeing the Turkes Sabboth, that the Moone about eight a clocke at night was much eclipsed, which made the Turkes expect some great accident. The Grand Seignior hauing formerly caused it to be bruited, That he would about that time passe to visit a new Mosque which was then in building; whereupon all the streets were hanged with cloth and arras, and as the custome was, a crie went before, that The King commeth; at the noise whereof Nassuf (beeing then in his house) could not but descend to salute the Sultan as he passed by: But it was not the Graund Seignior himselfe, but his Bostangi Bassa, whom he had caused to be attired like himselfe, who being come before Nassufs dore, and finding him standing there, he suddenly leapt vnto him, and told him that the Sultans pleasure was he should deliuer vp his seale: whereat Nassuf being amazed, demanded what the Sultan meant to doe? to whome the Bostangi Bassa replied, That he knew not what the Princes pleasure was, but if he would not deliuer it, hee would returne with that message vnto him. Whereupon Nassuf drew the seale out of his bosome, and deliuered it. Then the Bostangi Bassa shewed him a warrant for his head, whereunto he presently submitted himselfe, and then two Iamoglans strangled him: his head was presently cut off, and carried to the Graund Seigniour, and his bodie throwne into the street to be trampled on.

It was

It was thought his death was procured by the wife of Cicala, Bassa of Babylon, who had beene manzoled or deposed from his gouernment there by Nassuf, and was a little before returned to Constantinopole, but could not bee allowed by Nassuf to haue any accesse vnto the Grand Seigniors presence; whereupon hee wrote a letter vnto the Sultan, wherein hee accused Nassuf to haue conspired with the Persian to kill him, charging him with many things that were capitall. This letter he sent by his wife who was sister to the Grand Seignior; who comming to his speech (although shee were watchfully obserued by Nassuf who was then present) left the letter in his chamber and so departed. The Grand Seignour finding this letter, and reading it, was much incensed against Nassuf, and neuer quiet in minde vntill he had his head. He writes, that there were found in Nassufs house eightie bags of gold, each bag containing ten thousand chequinos. After Nassufs death Mechmet Bassa Admirall at sea (who had married Sultan Achmats eldest daughter) was made chiefe Visier; he was borne in Constantinople, and the first naturall Turke that was euer Visier since Constantinople was wonne.

You haue heard in the last yeares relation, of some combustions which were growing in Transyluania, and how the Sultan had written his letters of an imperious stile vnto the nobilitie and States of the countrey, which letters were fixed vp in forme of a mandate throughout all Transyluania, and in places that were neerest vnto those Noblemen which held the Emperours partie against Bethlem. At the same time Bethlem defeated certaine troupes of the garrisons at Lippa and Genoa, which ouerranne and spoyled the Countrey, so as the Gouernours of those places were forced to send to Vienna, to demand succours of men and money. A Chiaus arriued at that time at Lintz, bringing letters vnto the Emperour from the Graund Seigniour; the first point contained in them, was, That his Imperiall Maiestie should haue a care, that the peace made betwixt them for twentie yeares should not be violated; and that for his part hee desired to obserue it faithfully. 2. That in the name of his Imperiall Maiestie they had seised vpon certaine places in Transyluania, a Prouince which had beene alwaies vnder his protection, which receiued her Princes from his hand, and the which he was bound to defend against all her enemies. 3. That the tyranny of Prince Battori had constrained him to giue forces to Bethlem Gabor to dispossesse him of the principalitie of Transyluania: That after the death of the said Battori, he had inuested Bethlem to gouerne it in peace. 4. That since, he had bin aduertised how that some troups of souldiers in the name of his Imperiall Maiestie, contrary to the articles of peace, had by force seised vpon the forts of Hust and Viuar, and the townes of Nagipan and Tonac. 5. That hee had giuen expresse charge to Bethlem, not to suffer any enterprise, no not vpon the least village of his principalitie, to the end that nothing might be separated; but that he should repell the iniurie of the aggressor by force. 6. That he exhorted his imperiall maiestie, if he desired the continuance of the peace, to command his people to make restitution of the places vsurped, or to signifie his intention by the same Chiaus which he had sent, to the end hee might be fully assured: for the mischiefe increasing daily, the affection which hee bare to the good of peace might grow cold.

The Emperour receiued the Chiaus at Lintz verie honourably, and gaue him an answer to his letter wrapt in a piece of cloth of gold: the sence whereof was, That this businesse being of great importance, his Imperiall Maiestie desired to confer with the princes Electors, and States of the Empire to heare their aduice; after which hee would acquaint him with his last resolution: and finally, that he should rest assured, that for his part he would not attempt any thing contrarie to the peace. In the meane time there was a pettie warre in Hungarie, the incursions and spoiles betwixt the Christians and the Turkes beginning againe. The Turkes of the garrison of Agria going foorth, tooke a great number of cattell from the Christians; eight hundred Haiduckes aduertised of this spoyle, pursued them so speedily as they met them before they came within halfe a league of their retreat, when they made them to leaue their prize, and put them to flight. The Bassa of Agria aduertised of the defeate of his out-riders, goeth foorth with one thousand men, to recouer the booty from the Haiduckes, which they had newly taken from his souldiers: But after a sharpe encounter he lost his horse, and two hundred of his men, beeing forced to make his retreat.

This tempest continued many daies, and during the violence thereof, another galliE was lost, in the which the Iesuites had beene, by good aduice they had retired to land during the furie of the sea and winds. The Iesuits imputed the cause of this losse, to the prohibition which Oneze the Bassa had made vnto them, not to passe into Mingrelia before the peace were concluded with the Princes of that countrie; the which grew long, by reason of the difficulties which happened in the treatie. The liberte of [illegible] peace, Grangier and his companions proceeded in their journey; twentie dayes after their departure from Macrogalo, they arriued at Satrapella, a place of Georgia, whereas the Princes Visier came to visit them, and after the Georgian manner saluted them, bare headed, and kneeling vpon one knee. Gorell Prince of the Georgians (who was then at Barlet, whereas the court was to passe the feast of Christenmas) beeing aduertised of the arriuall of these new Christian and French preachers, sent for them, receiued them fauourably, and saluted them bare headed and kneeling. After that he had made them to blesse his court, hee held many discourses with them of the trueth of the Romane Church: and of the Popes pōwer, as the father of all Christendome; beeing mooued partly thereunto by a feeling of pietie to the Church, and partly from the instructions hee receiued from these Iesuites, so as enlightened with a new beame of the true light, he intreated Grangier to craue absolution of his sinnes from the Pope, the which (said hee) hee may giue mee by the power he hath from God; promising to send him his confession in writing. But vnderstanding that the Iesuite had power from the Pope to absolue him, hee purged his conscience of all his sinnes, by a generall confession of his life. Without doubt the zeale of these soules, so far from succor, shews plainly what the haruest would be, if so many labourers were sent as are necessarie. A Monke of Georgia, who had liued at Rome for the space of twelue yeares, had in former times planted pietie there: the which they of this mission did now alter. This Prince Gorell entreated the Iesuites, to send him some of their companie at their returne into Europe, promising to make great esteeme of them, and to giue them a church, a house, and all things necessarie for their maintenance. The prince offered them siluer, which they refused, modestly excusing themselues vpon the rules of their institution, which forbids them to receiue any temporall recompence for the administration of holy things. Thus they parted from this prince, who commended much their manner of liuing, and caused them to be conducted to Satrapella, to continue on their journey into Mingrelia.

The third of Februarie in the yeare 1615, they parted from this towne with the Turkes who came to conclude the peace, and passing by the bankes of Fasso (a Riuer which doth water the Countrey of Cholchos, now called Mingrelia) they arriued at Herailcano, otherwise called Heraclia, and from thence to Margoula, whereas the Prince of the Mingrelians (called Dodran) then remained, being busie in the reception of Threbis Cham king of Georgia, who was come thither to visit him, beeing expelled his Countrey by the King of Persia. The Iesuites were brought to kisse the hands of Prince Dodran, and of Lipartia his Vncle, who was Regent of the Realme during his minoritie. They both promised them assistance in their affaires, sending them to the towne of Macaurie, to make their abode there whilest they were busied in the affaires of their Countrey, the which at that time were somewhat confused. The Bishop of that place entertained them with great demonstration of loue, and soone after, making a feast to Threbis Cham, or Prince of the Georgians, hee would needs haue the Iesuites assist at this banquet, for a great testimonie of his loue. It is the manner of those of Cholchos or the Mingrelians, as wel as the Georgians, to sing at their meat. The Threbis Cham desired, that the Iesuites might sing some note when it came to their turne, whereof they excused themselues diuers times: But there was no remedie, they must doe as others haue done: whereupon they sung the hymne of Plange lingua, &c. appointed for Holie Thursday. Beeing thus fauourably entertained in Mingrelia, they make their residence at Mocaury, with hope to labour profitably for the health of soules, which erre in that countrey through the darkenesse of ignorance, for want of men to reach them the way of truth. This Archbishop lodgeth the mother in the Monasterie of religious women of our Ladie of Thessalonica, and giues the custodie of the sonne vnto an Abbot of Saint Michael, a man learned in all the sciences, vnder whome hee profited wonderfully, as well in the Greeke tongue as in many goodly arts. I doe wel know this to be true, for that I haue conuersed with him for the space of six months, and haue seene him often in the companie of learned men speake the Greeke, with as great facilitie as his Turkish and mother tongue. Hee continued in this Monasterie, vnder the care and gouernment of this learned Abbot, vntill the age of seuenteen yeares; that is to say, for the space of eight whole yeares; during which time, his mothers teares, the holy instructions of the Abbot (but rather the Diuine fauour) made him to enter into the way of his soules health, and become a Christian. The Archbishop of Thessalonica cleansed his soule from the pollutions of the Law of Mahomet, and baptised him in the Church of Saint Anastasius, without the citie of Thessalonica; yet secretly, for feare least the Eunuch comming to discouer this misterie, should abandon him, and publish abroad the place and estate of his solitarie aboad, and so be miserably taken. Thus Iacaia calling himselfe Sultan, being alreadie in some assurance of the Crowne of Heauen by the promises of holy baptisme, whilest that hee was in the beginning of his pretensions to that of the Turkish Empire, he leaues the Monasterie where he had beene instructed; and in the companie of the Eunuch trauels vp and

and downe Greece, passing away (in the length and varietie of his voyage) the impatiencie of his age and desires, and for that hee would not be knowne, hee takes vpon him the habite and the license of a Deruis or religious Turke. But when he came to the citie of Siopia, hee vnderstood the newes of the death of the Emperour Mahomet the third, his father, and the rejoycing for the new aduancement of Sultan Achmat to the Empire; learning at the same instant, that Mustapha his elder brother had beene strangled by the commandement of his father. T[illegible] hee conceiued for that hee had not beene bred vp at Constantinople with the rest, to receiue so rich a crowne as that of the Turkish Empire, made him to wauer in diuers irresolutions; sometimes hee would goe into Persia to the Sophie, to haue succours from him, and with him to make warre against his brother: sometimes hee would serue for a support and countenance to the Rebels of Asia, and iustifie their partie. After many discourses with the Eunuch touching his affaires, hee s[illegible]n vnto the sonne of Peri Bassa, a Rebell against the Emperour Achmat; the Eunuch treats for his Master, and receiues for him the Rebels oath; and returning to Tarlis, where the Sultan Iacaia remained, hee conducted him to Peri Bassa, to bee the head of his troupes. Iacaia arriues and sees himselfe obeyed by an armie readie to fight: for the Defterden or treasurer being sent against the Rebell Peri by the Grand Seignior with seuen thousand horse and three thousand foot, was alreadie vpon the bankes of the riuer Bardate readie to giue him battell. The Bassaes troupes (beeing lesse in number of fighting men) went to assayle him. There was a sharpe encounter; but in the end the Defterden was victor, and the troupes of Peri Bassa defeated, and Iacaia beeing wounded in foure places [illegible] his bodie, was forced to saue himselfe on the other side of the riuer, where wandring vp and downe the fields, he found reliefe with a poore peasant, and soone after with an Abbot there by, who entertained him, and caused him to bee cured, holding him to be one of the Defterdens Pages, as he himselfe said.

He ioines wit the Rebels of Asia.

The Rebels defeated, and Iacaia wounded.

He sends to Constantinople and corrupted the Visier.

His wounds beeing cured, Iacaia returnes againe towards Greece, where hee findes his mother, conferres with her, and soone after with the Eunuch, of the estate of his affaires; and concludes with both of them, to send to Constantinople, to the Visier Deruis (who at that time was discontented with the Emperour Achmat) to sound his dispositon, and to see if hee might gaine him to his partie: The Eunuch vndertakes the voyage, hee speakes with the Deruis, and findes him disposed to entertaine the offers of Iacaia: The conspiracie was concluded, and they sweare to kil[illegible] Achmat, and to settle Iacaia in the Imperiall throne. Hereupon hee transports himselfe to C[illegible]nstantinople in a disguised habite: but when as they were readie to execute their enterp[illegible]ay they) the Deruis dyed; bee it that the Emperour Achmat had discouered their designe, or otherwise. Thus Iacaia beeing frustrate of his hope to effect any thing by this meanes, hee left the citie and fled towards the blacke sea, and then wandred into the countries of Valachia, and Moldauia, following the Carock of a Poland Embassador on foot, vntill he came vnto the citie of Cracouia, whereas Fortune had layed a snare for him, which brought him in danger of his life; for a Chiaus being come from Constantinople, and knowing him, he desired the king of Poland in his masters name, to stay him, assuring him that by this meanes, hee should strictly bind vnto him the affections of Sultan Achmat: the King refused his vniust demand, holding himselfe much honoured to see his Court the refuge of vnfortunate Princes. After this refusall the Chiaus flies to trecherie; hee corrupts certaine Tartarians of the Kings guard with money, who promised to murther Iacaia; and doubtlesse they had performed it, if a Flemish embroitherer had not aduertised him, and lent him his lodging for certaine dayes to hide himselfe; after which he freed himselfe from danger, and past to Prague towards the Emperour Rodulphus who was then liuing.

In this Imperiall Court hee found reliefe, and meanes to ease his forepast miseries: The Emperour furnished him with all things necessarie: Hee spent a whole yeare there, and was acknowledged during his abode, by many Turkes which came to Prague, for brother to their Emperour Achmat. There wanted nothing but succours to effect his designes: But hee findes nothing but faire words and good wishes at Prague; so as hee was forced to seeke the effects elsewhere. Certaine Saxons that were his friends, aduised him to passe to Florence to Ferdinand the great Duke of Tuscanie: hee takes directions from that Princes

A Embassador residing at Prague, and goes on his journie: but entering into Italie; he heares that Ferdinand was dead; these mournfull newes made him to resolue to seeke some other place; if Cosmo successor to Ferdinand, and the great Ducheese his mother, had not called him backe. He came then to Florence, where he was honourably entertained, and lodged for the safetie of his person in the fort of S. Iohn, where he was supplied with all sorts of commodities. The great Duke Cosmo gaue him the title of Excellencie, appointed him horses and caroches, and such companie as he delighted in, for the pleasure of hunting. He had not staid long at Florence, but he saw himselfe assisted with such forces as he desired. The great Duke Cosmo caused his gallions to be armed, sending them into the Leuant, vnder the command of the knight Beauregard, where hee had conference with Nassuf Bassa, at that time chiefe of the Rebels of B Asia. He offers him men, armes, and money, if he would come to land and march towards Persia, whither many Rebels were retired. But he who commanded the Florentine gallions, had no commission to leaue him in the hands of Nassuf: wherefore he carried him backe to Florence to his Highnesse.

He maketh a voyage into the Leuant with the dukes gallions.

During the time that Iacaia was a[illegible]rd the gallions, the great Duke sent diuers persons into many parts of the Leuant, to infor[illegible]e themselues carefully of these things which he had deliuered, not onely touching his owne person, but also of his mother; and they all brought backe certaine proofes of the truth of his discourses. This gaue the great Duke subiect to impart this faire occasion vnto Spaine, to labour for the common good of Christendome: He wrote vnto the Catholique King, and enformed him of the qualitie of Iacaia, to the end
C that contributing succours to his personage, they might vndertake some happie enterprise against the Turke. The King of Spaine was content hee should be sent to Naples; commaunding the Viceroy to giue him a reception fit for his qualitie. Iacaia went on his journey, beeing accompanied by some, by the great Dukes commandement: but according to the newes which hee receiued from Naples, hee stayed at Auerso, where hee was receiued by the Gouernour with much honour. The Viceroy came to visite him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie. But as the counsell of Spaine was tedious in their resolutions, and delayed too long (as Iacaia supposed) the succours which hee expected; he parted from Auerso to goe to Millan, and from thence in a disguised habit past againe into the Leuant, to sound their willes that might aduance his pretentions, and bring them to D a happie end: but he preuailed as little as he had done before. Besides all these voyages which we haue described, to the end he might leaue no meanes vnattempted to aduance his affaires, he went to Rome to kisse his Holinesse feet. Cardinall Belarmine receiued him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie: the Pope assured him of his affection and succours; but it was necessarie the secular powers should begin to leuie men, and make the first ouerture to warre.

Iacaia goes to Naples and Millan.

He comes to Rome.

Since, we haue seene him in France, and at Paris, vnder the protection of the Duke of Neuers, entertained by the bountie of this prince, and assisted by his councell: and doubtlesse if the troublesome combustions of a ciuill war had not directed the armies of this duke, we had
E ces, to the ruine of the Turks, and the good of Christendome. Finally, as for this Turke called Iacaia, terming himselfe eldest brother to the Emperor Achmat now raigning at Constantinople, and for such acknowledged by many: yet some affirme (yea such as haue conuersed in the East) that Sultan Mahomet had but three sonnes, which were Mustapha, Achmat, and Osman: Notwithstanding it is hard to discouer in this personage any signes of an imposture: [illegible]ame
F tyrannie of the Turke; as he held it by vsurpation, without any iust title [illegible] all crueltie and inhumanitie, preferring crueltie before clemencie, and [illegible] who said openly, That he respected not the loue of his subiects [illegible]hey feared him. [illegible] Stephano at his first enterance plotted how hee might root [illegible] Countrey, whom in their language they call Boyers, in the countrey, both for that they supported Constantine, as for the jealousie he had of them, being best able to resist his tyrannous designes: beeing also the common disposition of such as vsurpe any estate by wicked practises, to be alwaies in feare to be dispossessed, and to be entreated according to their merits. Hee began first with the Lord of Botacan brother to the Princesse widow to Ieremie, whom he caused with two others of the chiefe noblemen to be miserably and inhumanely empailed, as if they had been two notable theeues and murderers; and not content i[illegible] hee caused threescore and fifteene Boyers to be apprehended, cutting off all their heads, [illegible]d would not pardon any one, notwithstanding the great instance that was made by their kinsfolkes; charging them with the crime of treason, as if they had conspired against his person, hauing no proofe at all: but these his cruelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had perswaded himselfe; but contrariwise they were the more incensed, and many of them tooke armes openly, and had then seised [illegible] him, beene reuenged of his cruelties, and set their countrey at libertie (which had not beene ruined as it was afterwards) if hee had not beene assisted by the citizens of Yas; whome hee conjured to second him in this occasion, promising them immunites of all subsidies: In regard of which promise, these poore wretches preferring their priuat profit before their pulique safetie, employed themselues in the seruice of this tyrant, and fought valiantly against the Boyers, who were come to assault him in the citie of Yas; But finding that hee was better assisted than they expected; after some light skirmish they retired as well as they could, whereof many were taken prisoners, whom the tyrant caused to be sla[illegible]n cold bloud, or empailed to terrifie the rest.

Prince Alexander called into Moldauia by the Boyers.

The Boyers which escaped from this defeat, knowing that there was no hope of mercie in Stephano, who was full of reuenge; nor by consequence any safetie in Moldauia during his gouernment, they resolued to haue recourse vnto the princesse (widow to Ieremie) who had fled into Polonia when as she receiued newes of the taking of her sonne Constantine. This Princesse vnderstanding from the Boyers of the tyrannous gouernement of Stephano, and that most of the Moldauians were resolued to shake off the yoke of his tyrannie, and desired to haue prince Alexander in his place, remembring the good vsage they had receiued from the deceased prince Ieremie his father. These considerations, together with a desire of command vnder her sonne (who was then but sixteen yeares old) were strong motiues to perswade both her and her sonne to embrace this occasion, the which they imparted to prince Visinouiskie sonne in law to the princesse; and to prince Correskie, who at that time aspired to marrie her yongest daughter: These princes not onely allowed of [illegible]design, but they offered themselues willingly to accompanie Prince Alexander into Mol[illegible]and to take the whole care of his armie. This resolution beeing taken they presently emp[illegible]ll their credit to leuie men, and had within lesse than two months drawn together ten or twelue thousand foot and horse, Polonians, Cossacks and Transyluanians: whereof the Vayuod Stephano being aduertised, he presently leuied what forces he could, of Moldauians, Tartarians and Valachians, hauing drawne together an armie of almost 20000 men, which hee kept about Yas, and there resolued to attend the princes of Polonia.

The fort of Cochina yeelded vnto prince Alexander.

Prince Alexander beeing aduanced with his armie within two leagues of Caminithe in Podolia, hee was much troubled to passe the riuer of Niestre, which diuides that Countrey from Moldauia, fearing the fort of Cochina, in the which there was a strong garrison of Moldauians, and store of munition to defend the passage of the said riuer: but it fell out happily for Prince Alexander; for the Captaine which commaunded in the said fort, beeing much discontented at the cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, came voluntarily of himselfe to offer his seruice to Alexander, and brought him the keyes of the fort, leauing all to his disposition; so as hee past his armie easily into Moldauia, and in signe of joy discharged many vollies of his great ordnance, which made Stephano distrust the affections of the Moldauians, and to feele a pricking in his conscience, which doth neuer abandon tyrants and vsurpers.

1500 Tartarians defeated by the Cossackes.

Prince Alexander making some stay with his armie at Cochina in the yeare 1615, aduanced towards Yas, and being come within halfe a daies journey, he sent forth eight hundred Cossackes (chosen out of a great number) to discouer the countenance of his enemies armie: but they were not farre aduanced, before they encountered 1500 Tartarians, sent by Stephano

Stephano to giue some charge to the Polonians. Although the Cossackes were fewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in disorder, they charged them so resolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the rest to rout. After which exploit they brought word to Prince Alexander, that Stephano's army might be about the number of fifteen thousand men; but they were such as were gathered vp in the country, and not trained vp to armes, who were rather drawne to it by constraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This happy successe, together with the report made by the Cossackes, did greatly encourage Alexanders army, being also much incensed against Stephano for certaine letters which he had written to their Prince, full of threats, as if both he and they had been already at his mercie, the which did the more encourage the Polonians, and made them resolue rather to die fighting, than to fall into the hands of this cruell tyrant. The same day there came certain deputies of the Moldauians to Prince Alexander, without the priuitie of Stephano, to know what his designe was, and to intreat him to take pittie of Moldauia, which was threatned with a speedie ruine, if the war continued any longer; to whom the Prince made answer, That his intent was not to oppresse Moldauia, but to free it from the tyrannie of Stephano; that he had beene inuited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come vnto him into Polonia to that end, and had giuen him assurance, that it was the common desire of the Moldauians. That vpon this confidence he had marched with what forces he could draw together, and that if he did preuaile in his designes (as he assured himselfe with their assistance) he would gouerne them with no lesse mildnesse than his father Prince Iermie had done, whose sonne and lawfull successor he was. The deputies returned well satisfied with this answer, and hauing published it in diuers places, many Moldauians came and ioyned with the Prince his armie, and assisted him faithfully in this action.

Deputies sent from the Moldauians to Prince Alexander.

In October Prince Alexander aduancing about three leagues with his armie, hee made a stand in a faire Champian where there were good Springs to refresh them, and in the meane time he called a Councell at warre, to resolue what course he should take, and when he should draw the enemie to fight. In the meane time hee had sent a troupe of Cossackes to discouer the armie; who brought word that they were ranged in battell, and that they had twenty cannons readie in front, the which did not much amaze Prince Alexander, for that some dayes before, the Generall of Stephano's artillerie had sent to assure him, that if hee gaue battell, hee would annoy his men, as little as hee could, hauing a desire to serue the Prince, and by this means be reuenged of Stephano, who had caused his brother in lawes head to be cut off, vpon a false suspect which hee had conceiued against him beeing innocent. The which should teach Princes, that nothing doth procure them more secret enemies than crueltie, and that at one time or other they in whom they most relie abandon them when as they least expect it. The Vayuod Stephano meaning to make a second discouerie of the Princes armie, sent 1200 Tartarians, and two or three hundred Moldauians, who being seene a far off (for that it was in a plain champaine) the Prince sent 500 Cossacks with 400 Polonian lances to encounter them: The Tartarians perceiuing it, made a shew at the first as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from their camp; and being about a league off, they made a stand, thinking that they durst not charge them: but they were soone deceiued, for the Polonians fell vpon the Tartarians with such furie, as they ouerthrew them, and slew most of them, so as there escaped not aboue fiue or six hundred, who retiring to their campe caused a great amasement. The Princes armie was much encouraged by this exploit, and increased daily in number, as it is vsuall in ciuill war to follow that partie which hath the first aduanced.

A second defeat of Stephano's Tartarians

Presently after this execution, the Prince meaning to aduance his armie towards the enemies campe, his foreward was stayed by a battalion of one thousand horse, who had the night before seised vpon a narrow passage, betwixt a poole and a marish, by the which they knew the Polonian armie must passe: but this obstacle was soone taken away, by the aduice which was giuen by certaine Moldauians, to send a companie of horsemen by a way vnknowne to the enemie, by which meanes they might surprise them behinde, before they should be discouered. The execution of this stratagem was giuen to the Cossacks, who speedily went, being guided by certaine Moldauians; who comming within 50 paces of the enemie vndiscouered, they charged them, & were seconded so fitly by the forward, that staid on the

the other side; as of one thousand horse there returned not aboue fiftie to their campe, to car- G rie newes of their bad successe.

Prince Alexander hauing happily opened this passage, he aduanced with his armie within cannon shot of Stephano's campe. Prince Visnouiskie was of opinion, that they should make a kinde of inclosure with their carts, which might serue them as a fort, hauing no place of retreat within ten leagues: the which being discouered by Stephano, hee shot certaine vollies of cannon thr[illegible] there were some souldiers slaine, and some hurt: and the Prince answered him with the like, but to small effect, for that night surprised them, neither had they aboue eight small pieces. Prince Visnouiskie spent the night to encourage his souldiers, letting them vnderstand that they had no reason to be amased, although their enemies were more in number, for that most of them were peasants, neuer trained vp in H armes nor seene battell; whereof they had had good proofe in many encounters, where they had euer beene victors ouer their enemies, although they were inferiour in number: That they were so many testimonies and assurances that God did fight for them, and would vse them to punish the tyrannies of Stephano, and his cruelties against Moldauia. Finally, if they were victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their duties) there was not any one but should returne loaden with rich spoyles and recompences from Prince Alexander. This did so encourage the souldiers, as they protested all with one voice, rather to die than to faile of their duties. during the which there were diuers skirmishes, wherein Alexanders partie had still the aduantage; so as it seemed they were so many presages of good Fortune which should befall them that day. The Princes armie was ordered by Visnouiskie, to whome Prince Alexander had giuen the charge of Generall, as most capable, hauing sundrie times giuen sufficient proofes of his sufficiencie and valour in other battels. This Generall seeing Stephano's horsemen diuided into three squadrons, and the Tartarians most aduanced, hee appointed the Cossackes to encounter with them: the which was iudiciously and discreetly done, for they both goe freely to the charge, neither are they couered with any armes, but onely with the skinnes of certaine beastes, wherewith they make themselues to seeme as fearefull as K they can, obseruing no order in their fighting, and vsing cries which are fearefull to such as are not accustomed vnto them; and beeing once broken, they seldome returne againe to the charge. The Polonian Lanciers called in their language Houssarskie, being about one thousand and fiue hundred men well armed made the second battalion of Alexanders armie, led by Prince Coreskie, and were placed on the right hand against 3000 Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldauian horsemen. The Hungarian foot beeing about 3000 men were in the middest of prince Alexanders armie, with the cannon, vpon a little hill of some aduantage; and on the left hand was the rest of the Chaualrie, who were led by the princes Alexander and Visnouiskie; and the baggage was a little behinde the foot in the campe where they had lodged the night before. The tyrant Stephano hauing disposed his armie into diuers squadrons, began about nine of the clocke in the morning to play with his cannon vpon Alexanders armie, who found that the Generall of the Artillerie had kept his promise, for most of the bullets flew ouer his men and hurt them not; vpon which confidence hee commaunded the Cossackes to charge the Tartarians which were aduanced, whom they soone defeated. At the same instant two thousand light horse gaue charge to the Hungarian footmen which guarded Stephano's cannon, and in an instant cut most of them in pieces, and the rest yeelded themselues; so as Alexander became master of his cannon. The tyrant seeing his Infanterie in danger to be defeated, and his cannon lost, caused a battalion of three thousand Valachian and Moldauian horsemen to aduance, who without doubt had recouered the cannon, but the gene- M rous Prince Coreskie with his Polonian Launciers charged them so furiously in the flanke, as that they slew almost the one halfe of them vpon the place, and put the rest that remained to rout. Presently after this followed another squadron, the which Coreskie perceiuing, he Comming to Buda they went to salute the Bassa which commanded there, who beeing a speciall friend to Stephano, put them in prison, violating the law of Nations obserued by the most barbarous; and afterwards he sent them to Braille whither the tyrant Stephano had fled. They say he gaue 15000 Chequinos in recompence to the Bassa, and to reuenge himselfe in some sort of Prince Alexander in the persons of his Embassadours, hee caused their heads to be cut off one night after supper, and their bodies to be cast into the Danowe. Stephano returnes into Moldauia.

Stephano hauing receiued foure thousand men from Michna prince of Va[illegible], and gathered together the reliques of his scattered armie, he marched toward Va[illegible]nia; whereof prince Alexander beeing aduertised, hee sent prince Coreskie with six thousand horse Polonians and Cossackes to Ticouch a strong frontier Towne, to guard that passage: And prince Alexander and Visnouiskie, they stayed at Yas with the rest of the armie to preserue the Countrey, and to preuent all alterations in fauour of Stephano; who had some intelligencers. Within few dayes after, the prince had newes that the Inhabitants of Horreoua (a Countrey in Moldauia containing about fifteene or sixteeene French leagues in circuit) were in armes, and had joyned with a great troupe of Tartarians to come and inuest him, knowing well that prince Coreskie was otherwise emplo[illegible] with part of the Polonian armie. Alexander stayed not to haue these Rebels come [illegible] as; but sent Visnouiskie his brother in law with such forces as he could draw together to [illegible]ncounter with them. They met together within two leagues of the citie, where Visnouiskie charged the Tartarians with such furie, as halfe of them were slaine vpon the place, and the rest of them fled: there were a great number of prisoners taken, and all the poore inhabitants of Horreoua were brought vnto Yas in token of triumph. The dead being numbred, there were found about eight hundred Tartarians and others slaine, and of the Polonians onely fiftie, and some hundred hurt.

The inhabitants of Horreoua defeated, with the Tartarians.

Prince Alexander hauing receiued newes of this defeat, was wonderfully glad, and went presently to horseback with his companie of French, which hee had onely reserued about him, to goe and meet with Visnouiskie, and to congratulate his happie victorie. This beeing done with many complements and embracings, hee cast his eye vpon the poore inhabitants of Horreoua, whome they led [illegible] troupe of sheepe, and had such commiseration on them, as he presently sent them ba[illegible]gaine, hauing taken their oath of fidelitie, hoping that this his clemencie would draw th[illegible] factious to obedience, hauing formerly tried the oppressions of a most cruell prince. P[illegible]ce Alexander hauing giuen thankes to God for this new and vnexpected victorie, hee sent a Gentleman vnto prince Coreskie, to aduertise him thereof, who at the same instant was busie to dispose of his troupes to meet with Stephano, who returned into Moldauia. The encounter was in a plaine Champaine, hauing on the one side the riuer of Sirette, the which diuides Moldauia from Valachia: the skirmish continued from ten of the clocke vntill it was noone with like aduantage; but prince Coreskie beeing aduertised that Stephano was in a squadron of horse which was some two hundred paces distant from him; he joyned vnto his troupe foure hundred Gerbeys, who were well armed, and led by a verie valiant Captaine, with the which hee charged him with such violence and furie as he forced them to giue backe, yet fighting in such sort, as the euent seemed to be doubtfull: the which beeing discouered by another of the princes Captaines, who led a troupe of fiue hundred light horse: he came so fitly to succour him, as Stephano and his horsemen were forced to flie, whome the prince pursued and cut in pieces. Stephano escaped with a troupe which he had reserued rather for the guard of his person than to fight. Prince Coreskie at his returne from the chase of his enemies, caused the dead to be numbred, where he found that of Stephano's side were three thousand and foure hundred men slaine vpon the place, besides those that were prisoners and wounded; and of his part onely three hundred and fiftie.

[illegible]phano defeated the second time.

Presently

Presently after this victorie, the season of the yeare beeing cold (it beeing the twelfeth of Nouember) prince Coreskie put his troupes into garrison, and returned with one hundred and fiftie horse to Yas, where hee was receiued with much honour and ioy. The princesse mother to Alexander, was yet in Poland, but being aduertised of her sonnes fortunat successe, she returned to Yas, and brought with her Prince Bougdan her youngest sonne, with Alexandrina her daughter, who was yet to marrie. At whose arriuall there was great feasting and ioy; then they began to treat of a marriage betwixt prince Coyaskie and the princesse Alexandrina, the which had beene then consummated, if Bellona had not opposed it, stirring vp new and more powerfull armies than the precedent, to exercise the vertues and valours of the said princes, and to trie the patience of the two louers, who loued one another reciprocally from their youth.

A false alarme giuen to Alexander.

To continue the deduction of new affaires which troubled the quiet of the said princes more than euer, you must vnderstand that about the end of Nouember this yeare 1615 they were aduertised that Michna prince of Valachia with a Bassa called Hebraim, came against them with an armie of fortie thousand men, Turkes, Tartarians, and Valachians, to succour the Vayuod Stephano: and moreouer, that Bethlem Gabor prince of Transyluania, had charge from the Graund Seignior to arme against them, and to assaile them; which in effect was a false alarme; for the said Bassa had beene sent by the Graund Seignior to bring Caphtanes (which are robes of cloth of gold which the Graund Seignior doth vsually send in fauour to princes that are vnder his power) both to Michna and Stephano, who hee held to be in peaceable possession of Moldauia; but not with any armie, nor with an intent to make warre against the said princes; for hee was yet ignorant what had passed against Stephano.

An embassador from prince Alexander to prince Michna

Notwithstanding the princes holding this aduertisement to be true, assembled a Councell of the chiefe Noblemen in Court, where it was resolued, That an Embassadour should bee speedily sent to prince Michna, both to know his intent, and to discouer whether he marched toward Moldauia, and with what forces. This charge was giuen vnto a braue Gentleman of Polonia called Boyartskie, who parted presently from Yas, and beeing entered into Valachia, hee vnderstood that prince Michna was then in his towne of Bonza, some twentie French leagues distant from the frontiers of Moldauia. The Embassadour beeing arriued demanded audience before Michna, by whom he was sent vnto the Bassa, who at his first enterance (without hearing the subiect of his Embassage) demanded, who had made his master Alexander so bold, as to carrie armes in the Countrey of the Grand Seignior without his authoritie; for the which hee should be punished, and those that did assist him: commanding the Embassador presently to be put in yrons, as if he had beene a theefe or some miserable caitife. The Embassadors seruants seeing how they entreated their master, escaped as they could, fearing the like; who returning to Yas, enformed prince Alexander what had passed, assuring him that Michna had no armie readie, nor any intent to enter into Moldauia at that time. The Bassa disdaining to speake any more to the said Embassadour, he gaue charge to some of his officers to examine him particularly of all matters concerning Alexander, and what forces hee had: And within few daies after hee returned to Constantinople, leading the said Embassadour thither with him. But as soone as they were arriued, they sent the Embassadour vnto the Diuano, where hee was againe examined by a Visier, and in the end hee was condemned by him to the gallies there to remaine perpetually. So little accompt doe these barbarous people make, to violate the Law of Nations, especially with Christians, presuming that all the World should bow vnto them, as if they were Gods vpon earth.

Prince Alexander sends an Embassador to Bethlem Gabor

There was another Embassadour sent by prince Alexander vnto Bethlem Gabor who was prince of Transyluania, beeing at Fureuar or Alba Iulia, whome hee receiued verie courteously; to whome the Embassadour deliuered the subiect of his charge. That prince Alexander his master had beene aduertised that hee made some leuie of men to ioyne with Michna prince of Valachia, and to make warre against him; the which hee could not easily beleeue, for that hee had made profession of friendship to his deceased father, and had no cause now to leaue it; entreating and coniuring him, not to meddle in the affaires which hee had to decide with Michna; and that in requitall (if any occasion were offered to serue him) hee would employ all his meanes. The Embassadour ha- G uing ended his speech, hee deliuered his princes letters of credit: To whome Betblem Gabor made this answere, that hee neuer had any intent to take armes, nor to attempt any thing against prince Alexander, whose father was his true friend; neither would hee euer giue any cause to discontinue this loue and friendship betwixt them, whereof he would giue good proofe in all occasions, especially in this subject now in question. The Embassadour was much satisfied with this answere, the which was also confirmed by Letters; yet hee afterwards leuied forces against prince Alexander, but he would not ioyne with Michna his armie.

To returne to the course of our Historie; presently after the Bassa his departure from Citouch to returne to Constantinople, Prince Michna sent an Embassador to Alexander with let- H ters, by the which he excused himselfe for the ill vsage of his Embassadour by the Bassa, protesting, that he was much grieued, and that it was not with his consent that he had carried him with him, promising him to employ his best meanes to mediate his deliuerie. Moreouer, that hee was not ignorant what authoritie and power the Grand Seignior had ouer him, whome he might not resist, nor by consequence his Bassaes; that he had no armie on foot, as he was giuen to vnderstand, and that his designe was not to support the cause of the Vayuod Stephano, vnlesse hee were forced by the commandement of the Graund Seignior. And whereas he entreated him to deliuer his enemie Stephano into his hands, hee could not doe it, vnlesse hee should violate the lawes of hospitalitie, in betraying his friend who had fled vnto him for succour, and withall hee should incurre the indignation of the Sultan, and bee in danger to be dispossessed of his owne estate, hauing no sufficient meanes to maintaine himselfe against I so great a power. Prince Alexander hauing heard this Embassador, and receiued an answer from the prince of Transyluania, by the aduice of his Councell, dismissed all his footmen, and part of the Cossackes, retaining onely fiue or sixe thousand men with him during the Winter.

Prince Visnouskie poisoned by a Priest.

About this time there was one of the most cursed and impious acts committed that euer was heard of. Prince Visnouskie who was a Protestant of the Greeke Church, hauing prepared at Christmas to receiue the Communion after their manner, the Priest (who had vsually serued him in that deuotion, beeing corrupted with money by his enemies) poysoned the bread; which the prince hauing receiued, hee suddenly fell sicke, and his torments were so vio- K lent, as he died the next day. This bred a suspition that he had beene poysoned; whereupon the Priest was apprehended, who presently confessed that hee was guiltie, and had been prouoked by his enemies. As his offence was horrible, beeing committed by a man of that Coat, who had made vse of so reuerent a Sacrament to poyson a prince beloued of all men for his rare vertues; so his punishment was verie seuere and long: being bound in a chaire made of copper wire, and a fire made round about him, so as hee was heard for twelue houres crying out fearefully for the insupportable paines which hee endured. Whilest that prince Alexander and his whole court mourned for this fatall and vnexpected accident, there arriued a spie which hee had sent into Valachia, to obserue the actions of Prince Michna, who gaue him to vnderstand that there was a Bassa arriued called Skinder, with a great and powerfull armie, L and that Stephano was there in like manner, who pressed them dayly to march into Moldauia; and to begin the warre, hee sent foure hundred men to surprise the towne of Berlada, whereas prince Coreskie had left part of his men in garrison during the Winter: who keeping bad guard, were surprised, and most of them cut in pieces, which so puffed vp Stephano with pride, as hee assured himselfe of an easie victorie. But prince Alexander hearing of this defeat, hee sent foure hundred Cossackes, who made such speed, as within three dayes after they arriued at Berlada a towne not walled, no more than the rest, where hauing set fire in many places, they forced his men to come forth, cutting them in pieces, and the rest were burnt; so as there escaped not aboue fiue or six to carrie this bad newes vnto their master, who was much afflicted.

Stephano's men defeated by the Cossackes.

A defeat of Turkes at Vasselloy.

At the same instant, when as the Cossackes were sent vpon this expedition, prince Coresky desiring to be reuenged for the defeat of his men, tooke two thousand and fiue hundred M choice horse, and put himselfe speedily into Vasselloy, fearing the garrison hee had left there

A there would be in like manner surprised: whereof the Bassa being aduertised, by some of the countreymen, he sent his sonne (being twelue or thirteene yeares old) and gaue him an old Turke of great experience for his conductor, with seuen thousand men, holding this a good occasion to get reputation to his sonne. Prince Coreskie being aduertised of his march by some Moldauians, and that they should surprise them early in the morning, knowing that they were of necessitie to passe a bridge of wood ouer a riuer that runnes by the towne, he disposed his men in such sort as that the enemie could hardly discouer them, some of them were lodged within Vasselloy, and the rest were couered with a little mountaine that adjoyned vpon the towne: when as some of the Turkes had passed the bridge, two squadrons sallied from the towne, and charged their foreward so furiously, as they were in a manner all put to the sword, and amongst them the conductor of the whole troupe, the which was no difficult thing to ex-
B ecute; for that the Turks who had marched in a manner all night, to arriue early in the morning, were benummed and halfe dead with cold; the rest of the Turkes which had not yet past, hearing the noyse of this hot alarme, durst not aduance, but retired speedily, fearing perchance that the Bassaes sonne might be lost as well as his conductor. Prince Coreskie pursued them vnto a village foure leagues distant from Vasselloy, killing and taking prisoners all hee found in the way. Among the prisoners there was one who gaue it out that he was neere kins- The Bassaes kinsman taken.
man vnto the Bassa, who beeing brought to Prince Alexander, he receiued him verie courteously, and gaue him a garment fit for him, hauing beene stript of his owne, he also gaue him a horse, and sent him backe vnto the Bassa with a good conuoy, to whom he sent a letter, by the
C which hee intreated him not to aduance in fauour of Stephano, promising that if the Graund Seignior would suffer him to enjoy Moldauia quietly, he would be most faithfull vnto him afterwards, and pay him the yearely accustomed tribute: whereof the Bassa made no great account; for he was wonderfully incensed, both for his sonnes bad successe in this enterprise, and for the death of his Turkish captaine.

Vpon the day of this victorie, prince Alexander sent fifteene hundred horse to fortifie prince Coreskie, whereof eight hundred were lodged in a certaine Borough six leagues from Ticouth, whereas the Bassa and Michna were then with their armie; being about fiue and twentie thousand men. These eight hundred men neglecting their guards, did nothing but 800 of prince Alexanders men slaine by their hostes for their insolencies.
drinke drunke, and molest their hostes with all kinde of insolencies, and forcing their wiues
D and daughters, which made them take a resolution to be reuenged, and to that end they called vnto them certaine Boyers out of the countrey, who chusing their time, cut all their throats when they were asleepe, and most of them drunke.

Prince Alexander retires to Cochina.

About the end of this yeare prince Alexander called a generall councell, whereas the princesse his mother, prince Coreskie, and all the chiefe noblemen and captaines assisted, where it was resolued that they should retire to Cochina, beeing thirtie French leagues off; for that it was the strongest place and the best furnished of all Moldauia, and withall they should be farre from their enemies, and neere vnto Polonia. According to this resolution, prince Alexander parted the next day with his whole armie, and came in foure daies march to Cochina, in the extreamest cold season that could be; hauing lodged his troupes, the princes
E sent diuers Gentlemen to all their friends and confederates to coniure them to come speedily to succour them; and in the meane time they gaue order to make prouision of victuals, and of all other things necessarie for their armie. The Bassa beeing aduertised of this retreat, hee marched with Michna and Stephano towards Yas, notwithstanding the extremitie of the cold, which was so violent that many dyed vpon the way; whereupon they stayed vntill the time was more milde.

Succours come to prince Alexander.

In the beginning of March, the lord of Tischewich came vnto Prince Alexander with 3500 Cossackes, and within few dayes after arriued the lord Potoskie, nephew to him who had been taken at the first battell, and carried prisoner to Constantinople, who brought with him a troupe of fifteene hundred Polonians well armed, there came also other succors vnto him, F so as by the end of that moneth the princes armie was ten or twelue thousand strong foot and horse.

Prince Alexander hearing of the enemies approch, hee sent foorth 1000 horse with his companie of French Caualliers to discouer the enemies armie, who staying to refresh themselues lodged: they were discouered and presently inuested by them and by a great number of Turks; and although that there were little hope to resist so great a multitude, yet Alexanders men (who had alwayes beene accustomed to vanquish) behaued themselues verie valiantly, desiring rather to die, than to yeeld basely without giuing proofes of their valour. This fight continued from 9 of the clocke in the morning, vntill night; and of the whole troupe there escaped but twelue, seuen Polonians, and fiue French, the rest were either slaine or taken prisoners, among the which was the captaine of the French companie called Mountespin, whom they would haue sent with the rest vnto the Grand Seigniors gallies: But Stephano preserued him vpon promise that he would doe him good seruice. Heere Fortune (which hath hitherto beene fauourable vnto prince Alexander) began to shew her inconstancie, [illegible]ach princes H not to runne rashly into dangers, although they haue had some aduant[illegible] ouer their enemies.

1616 At Constantinople about the end of August this yeare 1616, Enuie, the most furious Iesuites at Constantinople accused. of all the windes that shake the affaires of the World, stirred vp a horrible tempest, whose violent gusts fell dangerously vpon the Iesuites settled at Pera by the Sultans permission, at the persuasion of Henrie the fourth, the French King; and labours to cast them vpon the rockes where them might suffer shipwrecke, shamefull to their order, and preiudiciall to the Christians, which liue in the middest or Mahometisme. And to ruine them without all hope of helpe or relefe, they accused them before the Graund Visier, to bee spies to Spaine; to giue absolution to renegadoes; to baptize Turkes, to conceale fugitiue slaues, and to send I them into Christendome; and withall they obiected the doctrine of killing of kings, if they are commonly punished at Constantinople with death. They seised vpon their persons, and lodged them in a dungeon, they were six in number, that is to say, Francis Bouton, Denis Guthet, Dominick Maurice of Chio, and Iohn Baptista Iobert their superiour, all foure Priests, and two assistants, and with them a Francisean Frier, Vicar to the Patriarke of Constantinople. A suspition of danger in an estate is easily beleeued vpon the least accident.

In the meane time the Emperours Embassadour came to Constantinople, to renew the truce; they entered with their drummes beating and their ensignes displayed. They which thought to erect trophies to their glorie by their ruine of the Iesuites, made vse of this entrie, K and gaue false aduertisements to the Seraglio, that there were in Constantinople, and at Pera many thousands of Christians disguised in the habites of Greekes and Turkes, which came with this Embassadour, with an intent to put that in execution which the Iesuites had projected. Moreouer, they enformed the Grand Visier, and the Muphti, that the Churches in Pera, and the Embassadours houses were full of armies; and that now when as the Turkes estate, and especially Constantinople, was vnprouided of forces, hauing employed their armies in diuers places, and at one instant, as in Poland, Persia, and both the seas, that they meant to draw the Greekes into rebellion, and giue an entrie to the Cossackes, by the blacke sea. The Sultan and his Bassaes tooke an alarme, they commanded euerie man to weare the habit of his owne Nation, with a prohibition to weare any hat except the Frankes, and they L to weare a Grecian habit; they also enrolled all the Christians in Constantinople and Pera.
But the Sultan did not thinke his Citie of Constantinople free from the danger of surprise by this diligent search, but hee would seeke his assurance in the bloud of Christians: so The Turke commaunds all the Christians to be slaine. as hee commaunded that all the Frankes should bee slaine, without exception. But yet this commaundement tooke no effect, by reason of the remonstrances which the Graund Visier and the Muphti made him, representing vnto him, that by this crueltie hee should draw vpon his estate a dangerous warre from all the Christian princes in generall. But all this freed him nor from feare, hee walkes all night on horsebacke vp and downe the ci-tie, contrarie to his custome, and hee causeth a Friar, Vicar to the Patriarke, who had been taken with the Iesuites, to be executed in his presence; and he doth expressely forbid the pas- M sage from Constantinople to Pera, and from Pera to Constantinople. During this prohibition, the French Embassador had past from Pera to the City, to sollicite the Iesuites libertie.
At his returne he fou[illegible]he passage stopt, he goes vnto the Muphti, and leaues his people in

A the meane time at the sea side (for it is the custome, to goe to the Soueraigne of Mahomets law with a small traine) during the time of his being there, a multitude of people ran downe to the shore, to see these men, thinking for certaine, that they went to put them to death:
They lamenting their miserable fortune, and the Turkes charging them furiously with iniu-ries, as the men whom they thought practised by conspiracie their ruine. But the grand Visier hauing written with his owne hand, and sent one of his people to them that kept the passage, the Embassador with his whole traine was suffered to passe to Pera, but hee found the storme as raging at Pera as from whence hee came: for one night after, the people of that A tumult at place fell into such a furie, as it was to be feared the law of Nations would haue been violated Pera.
by the insolencie of some furious people, although the subject were of small importance. A-B bout fiue hundred paces from the French Embassadours quarter, there fell out a dispute in a lodging, betwixt some who spent the night in some kinde of employment: the Turkes that dwelt neere, beeing awaked with this noyse, ran to armes, and trouped together in the street, being in all 1000 men armed, crying out, that this noyse came from the Franckes, (that is to say from the Christians in the West, as Italians, French, Spanish, English, and others) who meant to rise; and they resolued to force the Embassadours houses, and to put all to fire and sword, if some better aduised of the troupe had not persuaded them to delay the execution vntill day, the which beeing come, the French Embassadour had meanes to get the Sultan to interpose his soueraigne authoritie, to bridle the insolencie of a multitude inconsiderately incensed. Such is the danger, in the which many times the ministers of Christian Princes find C themselues, who for their Masters seruice liue at the mercie of a Nation barbarously furious, as the Turkish:

The Iesuites in the meane time continued prisoners in the dungeon, vntill that the Baron The Iesuits set at libertie.
of Sansy Embassadour for France, had let the grand Visier see their innocencie, and procured their libertie, and the Sultan by his letters Patents did publish the falshood of the malicious accusations inuented against them: but to auoid the furie of a multitude blind in their passions, and dangerous in their furie, they went to sea to returne to France: but after they had sojourned sometime at the Dardanels, they were againe committed to prison, by reason of some certaine aduertisement that was giuen to the Sultan of the same substance; The Sultan informed himselfe truely of their probitie, gaue them their libertie, calling backe two to D Pera, in liue there, with the same priuiledges they formerly had, and suffered the rest to returne into France.

Alexander prince of Moldauia hauing lost a thousand horse neere vnto Cochina, the last yeare as you haue heard, the Bassa and Stephano were puft vp with this good successe; but Michna had no joy of it, who hearing that the Princes attended him at Cochina, with a reso- Michna feares to fight with the Polonians.
lution to defend themselues, remembring that a certaine Italian making a profession to foretell future things, had told him, That if he euer came to fight with the Polonians, hee would be in danger of his life. Wherefore by the aduice of his Chancellor and Camp-master, called Spaterlecha, he pretended, that he had receiued news from his Lieutenant, that there was a great troupe of Tartarians entred into Valachia, and spoiled the countrie; vpon which pretext hee E tooke leaue of the Bassa and returned, leauing all his souldiers in the armie, reseruing onely an hundred horse for his guard. Being in Valachia, Stephano wrote vnto him, that he had defeated the Polonians in battell, in the which there were slaine six thousand men vpon the place, and had taken a great number of prisoners, which they meant to send to the grand Seignior: all which was but a meere inuention to mocke Michna, and to make him sorrie that he was not in the action: whereupon hee was so much discontented, as he caused the heads of his Chancel-lour and Camp-master to be cut off, for their bad counsell, charging them that they had some secret intelligence with the Polonians.

About the end of March, the Bassa with Stephano, and a Tartarian Prince called Monoza, The Bassa and Stephano defeated at Cochina.
resolued to aduance with their whole armie (being twentie thousand men) towards Chochi-F na, and beeing within two leagues, they made a stand a whole day to refresh their men. In the meane time the princes put their armie in order of battell, in a little plain within a quarter of a league of Chochina, leauing 1000 choice horse within the towne vnder the command of prince Coreskie, assuring themselues that the Turks would not faile to campe betwixt the towne

towne and the princes armie, that if they were defeated, they might haue no meanes to retire G into the fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of cannon out of the fort, which they planted within a trench which was couered with a wood. The Bassa on the other side thought that hee had the princes at his mercie, being aduertised that they had not halfe so many men in their armie, early in the morning hee caused his men to march in good order, who arriued neere to Cochina by seuen of the clocke in the morning, where hauing made a stand to discouer the princes armie, he went and encamped betwixt them and the towne, as it had been foreseene. His men beeing put in order, the Tartarians who had a great desire to bee reuenged of the Cossackes, who had defeated them in many encounters, intreated to haue the point: the which was granted, and the trumpets sounding, they aduanced towards a battalion of Cossackes, nothing distrusting the cannon which was planted H on that side, and not seene. Comming within the shot, they presently playe[d] upon them, and ouerthrew a great number of the Tartarians and terrified the rest, the which the Cossacks perceiuing, they charged them furiously, and cut the rest in pieces, and so retired towards their armie, seeing another squadron of Valachians and Moldauians come to succour the Tartarians. The Lord of Tischeuich with his troupe of fifteene or sixteene hundred horse well armed, went to encounter the said squadron, which aduanced brauely towards the princes cannon. The combate was long without any shew of aduantage, which made the Marshall of the Turkes armie to send three thousand Turkes to succour them: and the princes caused a squadron of Cossackes and Moldauians to aduance, who carried them- I selues so valiantly, as they forced the Turkes to retire about an hundred paces. Then prince Alexander cried out, Now my companions, behold the enemie is in disorder, let vs charge them resolutely, and the victorie is certaine. After which hee aduanced with the rest of his armie, commanding two cannons to be shot off together, for a signe to Prince Coreskie that hee might sallie foorth, and charge the Turkes rereward, as it had beene resol-ued: But hee stayed not for the signall, beeing already aduanced aboue three hundred paces, fearing that the partie would bee ended without him, or that hee should fayle at need.

The Bassa seeing this stratageme, which he feared not, and the bad successe of his men which hee had sent to fight, and that hee was charged both before and behinde, hee began to be amased, and hauing caused a squadron of two thousand horse, Turkes and Valachians, to K aduance, to second his troupes, hee retyred apart with Stephano (who was no lesse afraid than himselfe) with the rest of the Turkish Cauallarie, to attend the euent of the battell. There was neuer a more furious combate seene, which continued for the space of two houres) full of fearefull howlings of Turks, who in the end fainted, seeing no succours come vnto them: whereas if the Bassa and the cowardly Stephano had ioined with them, they had without doubt fortified their carriages, and renued their forces; and by all apparance woon the victory, which they lost beyond all mans expectation. When as the Bassa and Stephano saw that their forces were in rout, and no meanes to draw them againe together, they began to make a retreat with aboue two thousand horse, which had not yet fought. In the meane time the prin- L ces Tischeuisch and Coreskie (like two thunderbolts of warre) cut all in pieces they could meet; and fearing left they should make a new head, the princes drew all their men together, and made a stand vpon the place of battell, nor suffering their soldiers to goe to the spoile, before they were assured that the enemie was retired in great haste, fearing the princes would haue pursued them, the which they would willingly haue done, if their men and horses had not been almost tyred in the former battell, in which there was slaine aboue 12000 men besides the wounded and prisoners.

Prince Alexander being returned to Cochina with the other Princes and noblemen, they gaue thankes to God for the victorie they had obtained against the Turkes and their confe-derates; and there was much joy with the Princesse and all the Ladies, who were retired into M the fort, attending the euent of this fearefull battell. Prince Coreskie burned with desire to enjoy his Mistresse, whome hee loued as his owne life; so as by a free consent of all parties, they were married within two dayes after the victorie, to the great content of all the Court.

Whilest

A Whilest that the princes began to enioy the fruits of their victorie, the Bassa and wretched Stephano returned to Yas, but finding no safetie there, they parted presently; the Bassa to Constantinople, and the tyrant into Valachia to Prince Michna, who was his onely support, notwithstanding that he had mocked him apparently. But before this wretch departed from Yas (hauing no hope euer to returne againe) hee caused the towne to be set on fire in many places, so as of two and twentie thousand houses, there were not aboue six hundred vntouched. The princes hauing aduice hereof in the beginning of Aprill, they marched speedily thither, where finding it so desolate, they resolued to pursue Stephano into Valachia, and punish him according to his deseruing. The next day they marched towards Valachia, being to passe the riuer of Siretta, there being on the other side a Borough in which Michna had foure hun- A defeat of 400 of Michna's men.
B dred men in garrison, to keepe the Frontiers. The princes arriuing at this place, the garrison put themselues in defence, but they were soone forced and cut in pieces, so as there escaped not one, and as for the enhabitants, they were well entreated, hauing made no resistance, and withall they hated Michna for the vexations they receiued from the said garrison. The armie hauing rested there three dayes, aduanced with all speed towards the citie of Bonza, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheere. The armie beeing come within a league of Bonza, it was discouered by some countreymen, who ran to aduertise their prince, wishing him to saue himselfe speedily, for that they had discouered the Polonian armie neere the citie. Michna was readie to sit downe to dinner, hauing inuited Stephano to accompanie him: but he was so amased at this Prince Michna and Stephano flyeth from Bonza
C vnexpected comming of the princes, as he ranne himselfe to his stable, and mounted vpon the first horse hee could finde, without saddle, and so tooke his way towards Tergouist, beeing followed by few of his people, one of which gaue him his owne horse, which was better furnished, and as for Stephano hauing sadled his owne horse, he fled all alone towards Nicopolis.

The princes beeing entered Bonza without resistance, they were wonderfully grieued that they had not found Stephano, which was their whole designe, and that prince Michna (to whom they intended no harme) had been so amazed. The armie at their first enterance spoyled the citie, which the princes could not hinder, nor yet the rauishing of many wiues and virgines, which drew the wrath of God vpon them, and in all appearance was the true cause of the D miseries which afterward befell the princes. During their abode at Bonza to refresh their men, many Boyers or Noblemen of the countrey (desiring to shake off the yoke of prince Michna's command, who gouerned insolently) came vnto prince Alexander, beseeching him to stay in Valachia, promising that the whole Nobilitie would willingly yeeld him all obedience and fidelitie. But the prince (hauing no intent to dispossesse Michna) thanked them for Prince Alexander refuseth the estate of Valachia.
their good will, the which the Boyers vnderstanding, they told him, that they would bee glad (seeing he refused it) that prince Cherbanne (who had been their Vayuod before Michna, and had beene expelled Valachia by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to retire into Germanie to the Emperour) might returne and take vpon him the gouernment of Valachia, entreating him to giue him passage through Moldauia if hee presented himselfe, the which prince Alexander E willingly granted, desiring much that prince Cherbanne were restored, for that Michna fauoured his enemie, and had himselfe a designe vpon the estate of Moldauia, which in the end hee obtained.

Prince Michna beeing come to Playa, which is betwixt Bonza and Tergouist, hee stayed some dayes there attending his traine, during the which hee sent speedily to his wife beeing at Tergouist, willing her to goe with all speed to Nicopolis: for that hee feared the princes would seise both vpon them and their estates, as they might easily haue done, if they had foreseene what afterwards befell them. Michna beeing come to Tergouist, hee Michna sends an Embassador to prince Alexander.
presently sent an Embassadour to prince Alexander, to know vpon what designe hee had entered Valachia with an armie, hauing no cause; but contrariwise, that hee had giuen good F testimonie that hee was his friend, for that hee would not assist the Bassa and Stephano, when they pursued him to Cochina, notwithstanding that they were much stronger in shew; That if his intent were onely to seise vpon Stephano, hee assured him that he was not with him, but was fled another way; promising that if hee could euer take him, he would deliuer towne and the princes armie, that if they were defeated, they might haue no meanes to retire C into the fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of cannon out of the fort, which they planted within a trench which was couered with a wood. The Bassa on the other side thought that hee had the princes at his mercie, being aduertised that hee had not halfe so many men in their armie; early in the morning hee caused his men to march in good order, who arriued neere to Cochina by seuen of the clocke in the morning, and hauing made a stand to discouer the princes armie, incamped betwixt the towne, as it had been greate desire to bee reuenged of the Cossacks increated to ma ced towards a that side,

A nothing holding the Visier to be still his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and comming neere him he alighted from his horse to doe him reuerence, and the Bassa did the like, where after some little conference together, he drew out the commission he had to seise vpon his person, and to carrie him to Constantinople; the which Stephano perceiuing, he turned him to his seruants, and willed them to shift for themselues, for that he saw he went to his death. His men being retired, the Chiaus who had his mace in his hand, gaue him a blow betwixt the shoulders, and then caused him to be bound hand and foot, and cast into a cart drawn by foure good horses, and in this manner they carried him to Constantinople; where being arriued, to auoid the punishment hee had deserued, he denied his faith, and became a renegado:
and withall he became very poore and miserable: for at the same instant that he was taken, the B Bassa sent to seise and carrie away whatsoeuer he had at Brahile and Nicopolis, where his wife remained, so as hee had nothing left him but the remorse of conscience that tormented him continually, for the barbarous cruelties which he had practised in Moldauia. Some of his men returned to Yas, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their presence, for which they generally gaue thanks vnto God, and were very joyfull.

Stephano carried to Constantinople and turns Turke.

Soone after, newes came to Yas, that the Sultan had appointed prince Michna to succeed Stephano in the principalitie of Moldauia (which is verie much better than that of Valachia) and that he sent Skinder Bassa his Generall in Europe, with a powerfull armie to settle the said Michna, and to expell Alexander. The which prooued so true, as on the 25 of Iune this yere C 1616, the said Bassa came to Tergouist, where prince Michna attended him, with great preparatiues both to receiue him, and to refresh his armie. The Bassa making his entry into Tergouist, had amongst other things of note thirtie or fortie musitians on horsebacke, playing vpon certaine instruments almost like vnto gitternes, which made but silly musicke; he had also many pages, who in stead of clokes, ware the skins of leopards, lions, and tygres, as if they meant to terrifie the world, and his armie consisted of about 20000 men, some Turks, some Tarta-rians, to whom Michna ioyned his forces, hauing 10000 horse and foot, which he had drawne from Valachia and the neighbor countries. The Bassa being entred the castle whereas prince Michna attended him, after many complements, they entred into a great hall well appointed, where the Bassa presented him his letters patents, and a robe which his master had sent to Michna, which he caused to be put on in the presence of all the noblemen of his court, pro-D claiming him prince and Vayuod of Moldauia, with many ceremonies too long to relate. After which, prince Michna led the Bassa into another great hall where a feast was prepared, as well for himselfe, as for such as hee would admit to his table, Michna offering to serue the said Bassa, but he would not suffer him, causing him to sit downe right against him. On the second of Iuly they parted from Tergouist, and marched into Moldauia, whereof the Polonian princes were aduertised: but the Princesse mother to Alexander maintained, that the Bassa came onely to bring the patents to prince Alexander her son; which dangerous opinion of hers grew by reason of the letters which Hebraim Bassa had sent to prince Alexander, not remembring that it came from a Turke his sworne enemie, and therefore not to be credited, especially in a matter of that importance, so as she was the cause of their vtter ruine.

Michna proclaimed prince of Moldauia.

E About this time the Generall of the king of Polonia's armie called Zolkelchy, enuying the honor which the Polonian Princes had gotten by so many victories, and withall drawn by his owne priuat interest, writ to prince Michna and the Bassa, that if they would promise to procure the Sultan to aduance the eldest son of the deceased prince Simeon (who liued with him) to be prince of Valachia (whereof his father had been formerly Vayuod) he would so weaken princes armie, as they should be forced to yeeld or flie. Whose demand being easily granted, this traitor writ to certaine captains of the Cossacks, that they should leaue the princes armie, and come with all speed into Poland, to accompanie Vladislaus their kings son, who had been chosen Duke of Muscouie, and meant to go thither with a great armie by reason of some crosses, and that they should be verie well paid. The Cossacks (who depend vpon the crowne of F Poland, seruing those that promise most) began to mutiny, saying plainly, That if they had not money speedily, they would retire into their countrey, yet concealing that they had been called to any other seruice; and without any long stay, there parted early in a morning about 8000, carrying with them great store of oxen, sheepe, and other cattell, with all the spoyles they had gotten in the precedent victories.

The treacherie of the Generall of Polonia.

The Cossacks mutinie and leaue prince Alexander.

Bicho generall of prince Alexanders armie forsakes him trecherously.

After their example, Bicho General of prince Alexanders army, whether corrupted by bribes, or for that hee had an apprehension of this powerfull armie which came against them, retired also secretly toward Michna and the Bassa, being followed by 2000 horse. This was a subiect of great amasement to the princes armie; and yet as if they had been inchanted by some deuillish charmes, they could not resolue to make a retreat, as they might easily haue done without danger. Many aduised prince Alexander to this course, euen prince Michna writ vnto him aduising him to retire into Polonia, before that his armie approched neerer to Yas; the which he did for feare of the successe; wherof his false prophet had forewarned him, as we haue formerly obserued: whereupon Alexander went to councel on the 25 of Iuly, but they could not resolue; the commanders and souldiers beeing much diuided, most of them d[illegible]ling their pay, else they would not fight; the which they tooke for a pretext of thei[illegible]eat. In the mean time the Tartarians, which made the vantgard of prince Michnas army, approched; which made the princes to leaue Yas, and to march toward Cochina; but they could not do it so secretly but the Tartarians were aduertised, who past speedily through the citie, and charged them in the reare, in which incounter George Potoskie, nephew to him that was taken with Constantine, hauing fought valiantly, and slaine many Tartarians with his own hand, was in the end shot thorow the bodie with an arrow, whereof he died presently. The lord of Tischeuich came speedily to the charge with a troupe of Cossacks which he had staied, and charged the Tartarians so furiously, as he slew 800 vpon the place, and put the re[illegible] to rout.

Prince Alexanders answer to Prince Michna

Alexander hauing receiued the letter aboue mentioned [illegible] prince Michna, he made answer, that (contrary to his promise to continue his friend, an[illegible]er to take armes against him) he had craued aid from the Turke to dispossesse him of Moldauia, to the which his predecessor had neuer pretended, neither could they according to the fundamental lawes of the countrie, and the conuentions accorded by the grand Seignior, when as the Moldauians submitted themselues vnder his soueraignetie, by the which no man could be Vayuod of Moldauia vnlesse he were borne in the countrey. Moreouer, he should remember that it was in his power to dispossesse him of Valachia, when as he entred Bonza with his armie in pursuit of Stephano; the which he would not do, nor detain any of his precious moueables, which he had reserued and sent vnto him: that if he abused the power which hee then had, God would not suffer so great an ingratitude and vsurpation to remaine vnpunished. And although his armie were far inferior to his, yet he would let him know, that he neither feared him nor the Bassa, putting his chiefe confidence in the assistance of the Almightie, who had in many occasions vsed them to abate the Turks pride, which he shou[illegible]ld or if he were a true Christian, rather than to joyne with them to satisfie his ambition.

Prince Michna hauing sent this letter to [illegible]nder Bassa Generall of the Turks army, he was so incensed, as hee presently commanded his Lieutenant to pursue the Polonians with 12000 choice men, they being then at Cotnard, betwixt Yas and Cochina. Prince Alexander being aduertised hereof, he suddenly caused his armie to aduance towards the fort of Cochina. At the same time the Chancellor to prince Cherbanne who came with 150 horse to prince Alexander, to assure him that his master was comming to his aid with fiue or six thousand men, was pursued by the Turks neere vnto Yas, whereas he thought to haue found the said prince, and of all his troupe onely himselfe and one more escaped, so as the prince could haue no certaine newes of the said Cherbanne. Prince Coreskie who had remained with 2500 horse not far from Cotnard, was also encountred by a great troupe of Turks and Tartarians, which hee could not well discouer by reason of a little mountaine that couered them: the Prince seeing some of them appeare, charged them; but finding that as hee defeated one troupe, a fresh succeded in his place, he was forced to make his retreat, with this aduantage, that he had almost slain 6000 of his enemies, hauing not lost aboue 250 of his owne men. But the prince was wounded with two arrowes, one in the thigh, and the other in the backe, which was a great disaster for himselfe and for the whole armie. Hee which commanded this troupe of Turkes beeing much amased at this vnexpected encounter, hauing gathered his men together, and joyned them to 15000 others whom the Bassa had sent, hee beeing yet at Yas, he caused this army to approch within a [illegible]uarter of a league to the Polonians, where hauing encouraged his men in what hee could, hee told them, that to shew his affection vnto the Sultans seruice in this occasion, hee was resolued to send a challenge to prince Coreskie, whome hee confest to

to be the most valiant of all the Polonian armie, so as he presently dispatched one of his captaines to goe vnto the prince, and to call him in the behalfe of his Generall. The Captaine comming to Alexanders campe, demaunded to speake with Prince Coreskie; who beeing brought vnto him, deliuered the charge he had from his Generall. The Prince, although hee were neither able to stand nor to sit on horseback, by reason of his wounds, yet would hee needs haue accepted this challenge, if prince Alexander, and the chiefe noblemen of the armie had not conjured him to excuse himselfe by reason of his indisposition: letting him know, that the euent of such a combat did not onely import him, but all those of his partie, who had their chiefe hope in him: whereunto the princesses added their instant intreaties; and among others his deare spouse, who was much afflicted for his wounds. The Lord of Tischeuich (a braue and valiant Gentleman) being then present, intreated prince Alexander to giue him leaue to accept of the challenge for prince Coreskie his cousin; the which was willingly granted: so as he sent a Gentleman with the said Turke, to know if the Generall would yeeld thereunto, which he did willingly, not beeing ignorant of the qualitie and valour of the said Tischeuich. It was agreed that the combate should bee betwixt both armies, lying in a plaine open field, within a quarter of a league one of another, with promise, that neither partie should be assisted.

A combat betwixt Tischeuich and the General of the Turks armie.

These two braue warriours hauing taken leaue of their friends, came to the place appoynted, in view of both armies. The Turkes Generall being about fiftie paces from his armie, caused water to bee brought, with the which hee washed his mouth, eyes, nose, eares, and priuie parts, beleeuing (according to his law) that this washing would serue as a purifying; then turning toward the East hee made his prayer: after which he went to horseback, beeing richly armed and furnished, and then marched softly towards his aduersarie, who attended him wel mounted and armed, and so they began their combat; their chiefe arms beeing bowes and arrowes, which they spent without hurting one another; till at last Tischeuich hauing a Petronell, shot the Turke thorow the bodie and ouerthrew him, who striuing to rise againe, Tischeuich passed ouer him with his horse, and wounded him in the right arme, and at the next blow slew him: after which he cut off his head, and carried it to prince Alexander.

The Polonians were verie joyfull of the happie successe of this famous combate, and the Turkes beeing much amased, aduertised the Bassa and Michna, that it was necessarie they should bring the rest of their armie and their cannon, if they would be reuenged of the Polonians. In the meane time the traitour Bicho, who had abandoned Prince Alexander, with a troupe of two thousand Tarrarians and Moldauians, found meanes to get before the Polonian armie, and to cut off the way betwixt Cotnarde and the towne of Bothocan six leagues off. The Valachians and Transyluanians led by the Generall of Michna's armie, inuested them vpon the right hand, and the bodie of the Turkes armie followed behinde: so as there remayned nothing but vpon the left hand a wood of timber trees which might fauour their retreat. Skinder Bassa hearing the successe of the combate, commaunded his armie to aduance presently with sixteene cannons. The Princes seeing themselues enuironed by so many enemies, they resolued to fortifie themselues with their carts and carriages, and to defend themselues: but what could fiue or sixe thousand men preuaile against two or three and twentie thousand; for so many were thought to bee in the Turkes armie: True it is, they expected daily Prince Cherbanne, and the Lord Bossi, who were within two dayes journey, and brought with them ten or twelue thousand men. This made the Bassa and Michna to aduance, to force the Polonians to yeeld, or to fight. Comming neere vnto their campe, and seeing them inuested on all sides but towards the wood, they approched their cannon, which had been able to haue spoyled their campe, but it was not their desigme; they onely desired to take the Princes and Princesses prisoners, with the chiefe Noblemen: Whereupon they sent to summon the Polonian armie to deliuer into their hands the said Princes and Lords, promising that the rest of the armie should depart with bag and baggage; whereunto they would not yeeld, but made an answere all with one consent, That they would rather die, than commit such baseneese and trecherie. This being reported to the Bassa, and prince Michna, they comcommaunded that some of their cannon should be charged with small bullets, and discharged through the Polonian armie; whereby there were a great number slaine and wounded. The princes who had but some small pieces, made certaine vollies, but to small purpose; neither had they any more bullets left, and little pouder: for that by ill chance part had been burnt some few dates before: so as all things seemed to foretell their ruine at hand. The Lord of Tischeuich, having iudiciously obserued, that remaining in that enclosure, he could not escape death, or at least captiuitie, resolued with fiue hundred horse (the most valiant among the Polonians) to force through three or foure squadrons which were set in guard by the wood side, to the end none might escape, that place being most suspected to the Turkes: the which they executed with such furie, as they ouerthrew all they encountered; shewing that it is a verie dangerous thing to make head against those who are reduced to that extremitie they must either vanquish or die. Prince Coreskie would not haue failed to haue made the like retreat, and to haue carried prince Alexander with him: but he could not sit on horseback by reason of his wounds; and besides, he had rather haue died than to leaue his wife in that extremitie. His last refuge was to disguise himselfe as well as he could, giuing it out, that he had escaped with Tischeuich, to the end hee might passe for a common souldier, if the prisoners were put to ransome. In like manner the princesses disguised themselues in the best manner they could, for the like intent.

A braue retreat made by Tischeuich.

The Turkes cannon hauing ouerthrowne many of their carriages, which serued as a rampier, two squadrons, one of Tartarians, and the other of Turkes, presented themselues at one instant in two seuerall places to force the Polonians campe: who seeing no meanes to make resistance, and to repell the enemie, layed downe their armes, crying out with a loud voice, That they yeelded: whereat their enemies were exceeding glad, desiring nothing more than to take these noble princes prisoners, and to dispose of the rest at their pleasures. The Turks and Tartarians hauing entered their campe, making spoile of all, and seising vpon what they could lay their hands on, beginning to share their prisoners, the princes Alexander and Bougdan, with their mother were deliuered vnto Skinder Bassa, who led them to Constantinople, whereas soone after their arriuall they forsooke their God, denied their faith, and became renegadoes, for feare of perpetuall imprisonment, where with they were threatned. For which Infidelitie Bougdan was presently punished; for hauing caused himselfe to be circumcised according to the law of Mahomet, he died, and the princesse his mother was confined to the old Seraglio. As for prince Coreskie (in this generall ruine of a Christian armie being forced to yeeld and submit it selfe to the Turkish tyrannie) hee had so disguised himselfe, as he past for a time vnknowne, and was led to Yassa among the common souldiers, where he was afterward discouered by a souldier of his owne people, who obtained his libertie by this base trecherie. The Turkish captaine who had gotten this prince, hearing of his qualitie by the aforesaid villaine, he led him to Skinder Bassa his General, who recompenced him well, and made both him and the souldier who discouered him, to take solemne oaths not to impart it to any man: for he had an intent to draw some great ransome from this prince, and to restore him to his former liberty, knowing wel that if he carried him to Constantinople, the grand Seignior would confine him into his prisons, by which meanes he should make no vse nor benefit by his taking. But it happened, that another perfidious of the Polonian armie aduertised Michna of Coreskies captiuitie, and in whose hands he was, who was so iealous, as he crost and ouerthrew the good designe of Skinder Bassa, telling him plainely in the presence of many, that he knew for certaine, prince Coreskie was among his slaues, and that he should beware he did not escape, for that the Graund Seignior would call him to account. The Generall made answere, that hee would be glad it were so, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michna for his good aduice. But fearing that if hee did what he intended, suffering prince Coreskie to escape for a ransome, the Sultan comming to the knowledge thereof, would be much incensed, and punish him with disgrace or death, the next day he told prince Michna plainely, that the aduice that he had giuen him was true, and that Coreskie had been found disguised amongst his other prisoners, whom he would present vnto his master, with the princes Alexander and Bougdan, as he did, of whose deliuerie you shall heare hereafter. The young princesse, wife to Coreskie, hauing disguised herselfe, and disfigured her face with her nayles, and other helpes, fell into into the hands of a Tartarian captain, with many others, who carried her into Tartaria, whereas shee was inhumanely intreated.

In the Mediterranean sea, Cosmo great Duke of Tuscanie, continued his enterprises this yeare against the Turkes: his gallies part from Ligorne, and run into the Leuant, in quest of some occasions to annoy these Infidels. They drew neere vnto Cerigo, in old time Cithaera; the fiue and twentieth of Aprill, where meeting with certaine Christian ships, some Venetians aduertised them, that in the Island of Chio, the Turkes had prepared two gallies to passe into Barbarie. Inghirami (Admirall to the great Duke) resolued to set vpon them; being on the way, hee turned with his fleet where they were to passe, and being couered by the night, hee cast anchor vnder castle Roux. But when hee attended a fauourable occasion, the Moone shining, discouered him to the Turkes, and the guards hauing aduertised the Turkes gallies, they presently began to flie, the one rowing amaine towards land, and the other continued her course at sea with all speed. Inghirami with his Admirall gallie got before that which was going to land, inuested it, beeing followed by the gallie called Saint Stephen, and three houres within night grapled with it, and laboured to enter it: but the Turkes (who were all good souldiers) defended it valiantly, so as they were aboue an houre fastened together, hewing one another furiously: yea the Turks (who were entered into Inghirami his gallie) fought valiantly vpon the hatches: but in the end the Florentines had the victorie, and tooke this Gallie, yet with much losse of Christian bloud. It was the Patron gallie of that famous Pirate Amurath Rase, which was commanunded by the sonne of Mammi a Portugall, called Mustapha Celebi, who was taken aliue, but sore wounded. The other gallie which had fled to sea and was the Captaine gallie of the said Amurath Raise, commanded by the Bey of Mitilene, nephew and sonne in law to that Pirate, called Amurath, who had married his daughter, beeing his mothers sonne, was inuested by the gallies of Saint Marie Magdalene, and the Patron Saint Cosmo; the combate was no lesse furious than the other, the Turks making a wonderfull defence: But after some houres fight, in which time the bloud of either side was aboundantly spilt, the Florentines had the victorie: Amurath Bey of Mitilene, was slaine, and Mustapha, whome these Turkish gallies carried to Algier in Barbarie. They were of fiue and twentie bankes a piece, carrying Lanthornes, and furnished with all things necessarie, and manned with foure hundred and twentie Ianizaries, all men of action, and practised in piracies with that pyrate Amurath Rais. In this prize the Florentines tooke two hundred and forty Turks, and freed foure hundred and thirty Christians: among the artillerie of these gallies, they recouered a cannon and two sacres of the gallie of Saint Iohn, and a sayle belonging to the Great Dukes Captaine gallie, which the Pyrat Amurath Reis had formerly spoyled. These Turkish gallies were loden with great store of rich commodities, the which was valued at two hundred thousand crownes. But this conquest was gotten with the losse of much bloud: for the Florentines had two hundred twentie three men wounded, and fiue and thirtie slaine in those two combats; the which made the Admirall Inghirami to rest satisfied in this voyage with the taking of two gallies, after which he returned to Ligorne.

Wee haue formerly made mention in the Iesuites businesse, beeing presented at Constantinople, of the entrie which the Emperors Embassador made into that citie. And this was the effect of his embassage. The peace concluded at Situa Torok, in the yeare 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was somewhat altered by the diuers interpretations and explications, which they made of the Articles therein contained. But this yeare 1616, in the moneth of March, the Embassadours of both their Imperiall Maiesties assembled at Vienna in Austria; that is to say, the Cardinall Forgatsie Archbishop of Strigonium, and Chancellour to the Emperour, the Cardinall *Klesse*l, Bishop of Vienna, the Baron of Rainek, Count Adolph Althen, the Earle of Solmes, the Earle of Thoron, and Pauli Apponi Nagi, for the Emperour: Hali Bassa of Buda, Achmat Tybaia, and Gaspar Gratsiani, for the Turke: where they concluded these following Articles; to take away all pretext of controuersie in the explication of those which were agreed vpon at Situa Torok. But it was after that Embassadours had beene sent of either side, as well to Constantinople, as to Prague, with royall and rich Presents.

Deputies meet at Vienna to confirme the peace betwixt the emperor & the Turke.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of Achmat Emperour of the Turkes.

Articles touching the differences of the peace.

1 For as much as many things haue happened of either side contrarie to the peace concluded at Situa Torok, it hath beene necessarie to confirme it anew, and to reduce it into the right course. Wherefore this holy peace made and concluded at Situa Torok, shall bee obserued for twentie yeares compleat, to begin at the date of these presents. Giuen in the moneth of Chomazilabil, in the yeare of the Prophet, 1024.

2 That the peace heretofore concluded at Situa Torok, shall remaine firme in all the articles, according to the treatie which the Emperor Rodulphus did send vnto vs, signed with his hand, and sealed with his seale, the which wee haue receiued willingly, and the same treatie wee also sent backe confirmed backe to the Emperor of the Romans the which he receiued in like manner. And this treaty which was sent vnto vs, is date the ninth of December, in the yeare 1606 of Iesus of reuerend and happie memorie: and that which we sent vnto the Emperor of Romans, wherewith he was satisfied, was dated in the yeare of the Prophet 1021.

3 Since the time that Agria, Canise, Alba-Regalis, Pesth, Buda, Zolnok, Hatwan, and other places haue beene taken, that the villages which were of their appurtenances. shall hereafter remaine annexed vnto them. But those villages which since the peace of Situa Torok, haue beene hindered from paying of their tribute by either side, or haue beene held by force, contrarie to the treatie of peace, that those villages shall be viewed by Commissaries appointed by vs and the Emperour of the Romanes, and presently shall bee set at libertie, and restored to their Lords and right owners. As for the Villages which pay tribute to either part, those which are scituate vpon the frontiers of the Emperour of the Romanes, towards Nonigrade and other places, shall be viewed by Commissaries thereunto deputed, who shall take a Register to the end those villages may not be molested by our neighbors. In like manner the Commissarie shall make a Register of the villages which pay to both sides, lying neere the townes of the Emperour of Romanes, of Strigonium and other places; to the end they may take notice what villages are bound, to the one or the other partie, that hereafter there might grow no controuersie. And for that which concerned the 158 villages about Strigonium, for the which there was some controuersie, the 69 lying nearest to the said towne shall be adiudged as it hath beene agreed, and the Commissaries of either side shall take order for it. The foresaid villages lying neere to Strigonium, and all others of the Realme of Hungarie, which shal be adiudged to the one or other partie shal not in any sort be disquieted, more than the antient custome, and there shall be nothing exacted from them more than the tribute.

The Iudges of villages shall pay vnto the Lord the tributes according to the antient custome; if the Iudges do not bring the tribute, the Bassa or Beg of the place shall sum mon the inhabitants three to the end their Iudges may come and pay the tribute, and if they doe it not after these summonings, he shall write vnto the next Gouernour for the Romane Emperor, that the Iudges of the villages may be sent vnto him with the tribute: And finally, if after all these formalities it be not paied, the Bassa or Beg, may vse force to fetch in these inhabitants, and make them slaues: the which shall be obserued throughout all the villages which owe vs tribute in the realme of Hungarie, yet nothing shall be exacted or demanded of them, more, than they haue been accustomed to pay in antient times. The commissaries deputed shall view and set downe by a ioynt consent the limits and bounds of the lands and Seigniories, which are held by either part in the vpper or lower Hungarie, and in the realmes of Croatia and Sclauonia.

4 They that shall breake the peace of either part, if they cannot be conuicted and punished instantly; we haue decreed, that there shall be order taken of either side, and iustice shall be done within three moneths. All prisoners of warre, and others which haue beene taken since the peace of Situa Torok, shall be set at libertie without ransome.

5 Achmet Tahaia hath presented vnto vs a Roule of places built and fortified since the peace, for the retreat of souldiers. Whereupon we haue ordained, that informations should be taken of all fortifications made on either side since the peace of Situa Torok; and if it be found that any fortification hath been made contrarie to the peace, it shall bee visited within foure moneths by the captains on both sides, or by a Nobleman of either partie, and the fortifications which shall be found to haue been thus made contrary to the peace shall be demolished.

6 And

6 And for that some wicked and malicious spirits, haue attempted many things vniustly to infringe this holy peace and good amitie; we haue ordained that if hereafter any persons of either side shall attempt or practise any thing that is wicked and lewd contrarie to the peace and mutuall correspondencie, wee will aduertise the Emperour of the Romans thereof: and in like manner the Roman Emperour, king of Hungarie and Bohemia, shall write vnto vs to our court, and no credit shall be giuen to the reports of such persons.

7 The Priests, religious men and Iesuites, among the people of holy Iesus, which follow the Popes religion, may build Temples in our realmes, there to say diuine seruice after their manner, and read the Gospell. Wee will yeeld them all fauour, and will not suffer any one to disturbe them contrarie to law and equitie.

8 It shall be lawfull for the inhabitants borne in the realme of Hungarie of either part to re-edifie the villages ruined and laied waste, and after they are inhabited, they shall pay tribute to the one and the other, if they be such villages as haue been accustomed to pay to both.

9 Merchants shall haue free leaue to traffique, passing from our port into those countries, and the transports of merchandise shall bee free to such as shall take letters from the Gouernours of the frontiers, or from the Receiuors of the thirties; the which they shall represent in passing, and the Lord of the place or the Receiuor shall attest the said letters, by his manuall signe or seale: for the which they shall not take any thing of the merchant. If the merchant be to passe by any dangerous place, they shall giue him a sufficient conuoy to conduct him in safetie: and after that the merchant hath paied of either side the thirtieth, which is the full due, no man shall molest him nor hinder him to goe where he pleaseth.

10 The merchants which would passe from the realms and seigniories of the Emperor of the Romanes and the house of Austria, into our kingdomes, with merchandise or money, shall come vnder the ensigne of the Emperor of Romans and shall haue his letters patents to vs, without the which they shall not be suffered to passe. And if they enter without ensigne or the said patents, the Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperor may seise vpon their vessels, merchandise, and money, and shall giue advice thereof vnto their Emperour. wherefore all the merchants of the Emperours countries of the house of Austria, and of the king of Spaine, both as well those of the Low Countries as his other realmes may come with all assurance into our realmes, with their ships, money, and merchandise, paying three in the hundred. And as for the Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperour, they shall pay vnto them two Aspers for the hundred: and in doing so the said Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperour, shall haue a care of the merchants affaires. If any merchant chance to die the Emperours Agent and Consull shall cause his goods to be sealed vp, and shall take them into their possession, to the which our Treasurer shall haue no colour of pretension. And when as the merchants haue paied the custome of three for the hundred in one place, they shall not bee bound to pay it in another for the same merchandise. If the merchants haue any controuersie amongst themselues, or with others, the Cadi or Iudge of that place may take knowledge of the cause, if it exceed not the value of 4000 aspers, but it shall be iudged by the Cadi of our Port.

11 As long as this holy peace shal continue, the posts which shall be sent with letters by the Bassaes, Begues, Lords, and Agents, or by the Visiers on our behalfe to the Emperour of the Romans; and respectiuely from him to our Court, shall be honourably entertained by our officers: and if the way be dangerous, they shall giue them assistance to conduct them into a place of safetie with their letters. And if the Agent which is with vs, desire to write any particular letter vnto the Emperour, and not send an expresse messenger, that this letter shall be carried by the post, and deliuered safely where it is directed. That the messengers of the Bassaes and Begues shall goe no more into the villages, but the Iudges shall bring the tribute and deliuer it where they ought.

An accord for the execution of the Articles touching the Villages in controuersie, and the raising of fortifications.

To conclude all differencies touching the diuision of Villages, and demolition of fortifications made in preiudice of the peace of Situa Torok: Wee the commissaries deputed, had agreed vpon the time of foure moneths: But for that all controuersies cannot bee decided within that time, by a common consens wee haue concluded the time of twelue moneths, for the expedition of all that shall remaine vndecivndecided; all things remaining in the same estate during the time. For the ending of these affaires G on the behalfe of the Maiestie of the Roman Emperour, shall be sent the noble Lord Adolph of Alsben Earle of the sacred Empire, with others according to his Maiesties good pleasure. And on the behalfe of the Othoman Emperour hath beene named the noble Lord Ali Visier Bassa.

For the greater assurance of these things, wee the said Commissioners haue caused six copies of this treatie to be dispatched in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkish tongues. And we the director or president of the priuie Councell to his Imperiall Maiestie, and Cardinall, with other Counsellors of his pri-uie Councell, and Commissioners, hauing full power and authoritie, haue confirmed these presents vnder our hands and the Seales of our armes.

As also we Ali Bassa of Buda, Visier to the most powerfull Sultan Achmat. Tybaia Mutafaraga, and Gaspar Gratiani Embassadors to the Turkish Emperor, with the Imperiall Mai[illegible] of the Roman H Emperour, hauing full power and authoritie to conclude this treatie, haue signed it wi[illegible]r hands, and sealed it with our ordinarie Seales: whereof there were three copies deliuered to either partie. Giuen at Vienna the first of March, 1616.

This new declaration of the Othoman Emperour, vpon the first Articles concluded at Situa Torok, shewes plainely how much the Turkes are of late daies refined from their antient barbarisme and rudenesse, hauing made themselues capable of great affaires. And these frequent meetings betwixt the Emperour of the Romans, and the Sultan, by their Embassadors, as a holy watering of the Olive tree of peace, seemes to make [illegible]o flourishing, as the sweet sauour may pierce further, and make vs hope that God will ma[illegible]se of this peacefull vnion, to I prepare vnto himselfe some meanes to a new haruest, or a healthfull conquest of soules wandring amidst the falshoods of the Alchoran.

Prince Coreshy his wife caried into Tartaria.

Alexandrina wife to prince Coreskie hauing been taken at that vnfortunat ouerthrow of the Polonian princes in Moldauia, by Skinder Bassa and prince Michna; shee was carried away (as you haue formerly heard) by a Tartarian Captaine, and led captiue vnknowne to Bialigrot, where shee receiued many indignities, beeing with childe; yea during the time of her lying in, which was fiue or six moneths after her taking: all which time shee bethought herselfe of a meanes to hasten her owne deliuerie, and withall to free a Polonian souldier called Iaques, who had carried armes vnder Prince Coreskie. This man although hee knew the Princesse well, and might by her discouerie haue purchased his owne libertie; yet hee K would not do it: wherefore the Princesse hauing tryed his fidelitie, taught him a meanes how to worke his owne libertie, and her[illegible]he end, by his care and diligence. The Tartarian being one day absent from his lodging, [illegible]ndria tooke occasion to talke with Iaques the Polonian; telling him, That hauing foun[illegible]n faithfull vnto her, shee would direct him a course, whereby hee might redeeme him[illegible]e from captiuitie; so as hee would principally obserue what shee did prescribe. Iaques hauing promised to execute whatsoeuer this ladie should enioyne him, yea with the hazard of his life; she then said vnto him: You know the Tartarian whose captiues we are, hath an elder brother, a very rich man, who of late is become blind and deafe, by reason of a great cattarch and defluction which is fallen downe into his eyes and eares, wherewith his brother seemes to be much afflicted: I haue a jewel which my L great Lord and husband gaue me when we were made sure, the which I haue kept carefully, hiding it sometimes in my haire, sometimes in my old tatterd rags which I haue worne since my captiuitie, the which I haue much esteemed; for that my deare spouse had assured mee, that the stone which was set in this jewell had many and singular vertues, and amongst others, that it would restore the sight, which had been lost by defluction, and cure deafenesse, so as it were not naturall or too inueterate. I am resolued to take out the stone, and deliuer it thee: after thou hast founded the Tartarian, whither hee will set thee at libertie if thou doest cure his brother of his infirmities; making him sweare solemnly not to retaine the stone, but to suffer thee to carrie it away, to the end thou maiest restore it vnto me without his knowledge. Hauing resolued vpon this plot, the Ladie said vnto him, You must also demand of the sicke M man a horse and some money, with passe-ports to goe into your Countrey, to the end thou maiest goe speedily to my deare husband, whersoeuer thou shalt heare of him, and to deliuer him my letters, and bring mee an answere if it be possible. The Polonian hauing sworne to per-

A performe whatsouer the Ladie commanded him beeing at libertie; the princesse deliuered him the stone, he swearing to restore it vnto her againe, as soone as he had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by violence.

The Polonian attended with impatiencie vntill the Tartarian did talke vnto him of his brothers infirmitie: who finding him one day much afflicted, tooke occasion to tell him, that hee knew a certaine meanes how to cure his brother, without any paine, or taking any thing inwardly: I beleeue nothing, replied the Tartarian; for all the Physitions in the Countrey could not doe it; but if he could effect his saying, hee promised to set him at libertie without ransome, and to giue him wherewithall to conduct him into his countrie: it is the recompence, said the prisoner, I meant to demand, and that you sweare vnto me by your great God
B not to faile of your promise when I haue performed mine, and not to retaine, nor suffer any one to take from me the thing I shall vse in the cure. The Tartarian hauing solemnly sworne, and layed his right hand vpon his heart, the Polonian tooke a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian although he distrusted his new physition, yet he acquainted his brother with the proiect, who beeing desirous to recouer his sences, intreated his brother not to neglect the offer, promising to saue him harmelesse, both in regard of the ransome which hee expected from the Polonian, and for the money he should giue him. The day appointed beeing come, the Tartarian prest the prisoner to perform his promise; to whom the sicke man also promised a horse and fiftie chequines to returne into his countrie, taking the same oath which his brother had formerly done. All things being readie, he applied his physicall stone,
C binding it fast to one of his eyes for the space of seuen houres, after which being taken away he saw clearely, and in like manner he recouered his other eye, and afterwards his hearing by the like application: whereat the Tartarians much reioyced, giuing vnto the Polonian what they had promised, and procuring him passe-ports from the Gouernour, without which hee could hardly get out of the countrie.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian Captaine that hee had a suit vnto Iaques seekes out Coreskie, him, that was, that the Polonian woman which was also his prisoner was his neere kinswoman, entreating him that in respect of his good office he had done to his brother, hee would vse her and her little infant better, and that as soone as he were returned into his countrey, he would take a course for her ransome, and it might be would bring it himselfe. The Polonian
D hauing acquainted the Ladie with what had past, and deliuered her iewell faithfully vnto her, hauing receiued her letters to prince Coreskie, and vowed to finde him out, hee tooke his leaue. This Polonian trauelling towards his countrey, met with one of the same nation, who freely of their aduentures, Iaques enquired carefully what was become of the princes which had beene carried prisoners to Constantinople by Skinder Bassa, and especially of Coreskie; and hearing that hee was in the prisons of the Blacke Sea, hee enquired by what meanes he might speake with this prince, or at least how hee might conuey some letters vnto him: to whome hee answered, that it was verie difficult, for that he was straightly guarded. But hee vnderstood that the French Embassadour had sometimes leaue to send to visit him, whereof E he might informe himselfe more particularly. After this, Iaques intreated his countryman to deliuer certaine letters which the princesse had written vnto her kinsfolkes, the which hee promised to performe faithfully, and so they parted. Iaques comming to Constantinople, hee grew acquainted with one of the French Embassadours men, who was sometimes employed to visit the prince, and to carrie him mony and other necessaries, by whose meanes hee got accesse vnto the Prince, and deliuered his letters, the which hee receiued with much joy, hearing of his wiues health. Eight daies after, the Polonian comming to visit the Prince, he receiued from him an answere to his wife, and so tooke his leaue; who after many troublesome encounters, returned to Bialigrot, where finding the Ladie all alone (the Tartarian He returnes into Tartaria. and his seruants being gone a hunting) he gaue an account vnto her of his negotiation, and F deliuered his letters, whereat shee was much joyed, hearing that hee was aliue, though infinitly grieued for his captiuitie, vnderstanding that the Grand Seignior had refused to put him to ransome. After their discourse, the princesse aduertised her faithful Agent, That since his departure, the Tartar had grown jealous of her qualitie, and had enquired of her what her husband, husband, her kinsfolkes and their eſtates were; to whome ſhe had anſwered, that her husband G was a captaine who had been taken priſoner with prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turkie; and as for her other kinsfolkes they were all ſouldiers, which had beene ruined during the troubles of Moldauia: deſiring the Polonian to remember it well, leaſt they ſhould be found to differ when they ſhould come to treat of her ranſome. The Tartari-an returning ſoone after to his houſe, he found Iaques the Polonian there, whom he entertained verie kindly, both in reward of the good offices he had done to his brother, and for the hope hee had of his priſoners ranſome, remembring that Iaques had told him that ſhe was his kinſwoman, and that it might be he would bring it. After ſome little diſcourſe, Iaques asked him, What ranſome hee would require for his Polonian Priſoner? to whom the Tartarian anſwe-red, That he would haue 6000 Chequines for her and her ſonne, vnleſſe hee would giue him H the ſtone with the which he had cured his brother: to whom the Polonian replyed, That as for the ſtone it was not in his power, hauing reſtored it to a Nobleman whome hee had followed when hee was taken priſoner. And as for the ranſome which hee demaunded for his priſoner and her childe, it was more than ſhe and all her kindred were worth, ſhe beeing wife to a Captaine who had beene taken priſoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of means was ſtill detained. The Tartarian interrupted him; ſaying, That hee vnderſtood ſhee was of noble extraction, and that ſhee had rich kinsfolkes, who would not ſuffer her to ſpend her life in captiuitie. I confeſſe, ſaid the Polonian, that ſhee is deſcended from Noble parents, but they are ruined during the troubles of Moldauia; adding withall, that he would not haue returned if he had thought hee would haue demaunded aboue 6000 Chequines, the which he I offered him, intreating him to accept it, in regard ſhee was his kinſwoman, and for the good office he had done for his brother. You haue beene ſatisfied, replyed the Tartarian, and haue no cauſe to complaine: Notwithſtanding after ſome conteſting, by the mediation of the captaines brother, who had beene ſo well cured, the ladies ranſome was ſet at three thouſand Chequines, whereof her faithfull agent gaue preſent intelligence to prince Charles brother to prince Coreskie, who ſent this ſumme with all poſſible ſpeed; and ſo the princeſſe and her little infant were redeemed from captiuitie, and conducted into Polonia by their faithfull Prince Coreskie his wife redeemed from the Tartarians. ſolicitor: From whence ſhee aduertiſed the prince by letters of her deliuerie. This relation was written by a Frenchman, who by his report was preſent in all the troubles of Molda-uia: but as touching her deliuerie by meanes of the cure, I cannot warrant it, but leaue it K to the cenſure of Phyſitions and Naturaliſts, who can beſt judge of the vertues of ſtones, hearbes, and plants; but it is certaine that ſhee was impriſoned and ranſomed as an vn-

1617 In the yeare 1617, there came to Paris a Chiaus, a Spaniſh Renegado, called Solyman, ſent A Chiaus ſent from Conſtantinople to Paris. from Conſtantinople with letters from the Emperor Achmat to the king, for the deliuerie of eight and twentie ſlaues, who had redeemed their libertie for money in diuers ports of Italie, and in their returne to Conſtantinople, had been taken by the ſhips of Marceilles: the King cauſed them to be ſet at libertie. But the Chiaus had alſo charge to intreat his Maieſtie to The cauſe of his voyage. cauſe juſtice to be done vnto the Moores Grannadines, expelled out of Spaine, and wronged in their goods and perſons, vpon their paſſage into France; wherein hee had what content- L ment he could expect of juſtice. Notwithſtanding he did witneſſe openly his amaſement at their long delaies, in the diſpatch of ſuits; ſaying plainly, That France which had the reputation throughout the world, to maintaine euery mans right inuiolably, did no Iuſtice, but after long and tedious purſuits; and that the execution of decrees, was many times longer than the ſuit it ſelfe. Whereas the Turkes Iuſtice (ſaid hee) was ſpeedily adminiſtred to euery man; and within eight dayes they ſaw an end of the greateſt and moſt important ſuits. This Chiaus was fauourably entertained, and defraied with his traine for the ſpace of ſix or ſeuen moneths at the kings charge.

The eſtate of the Turks Empire this yeare. As the Turkes eſtate hath not growne great but by combuſtions, ſo it is ordinarily full of troubles; whereby it ſeemes that the preſeruation thereof depends in making warre vpon M others, or to ſupport it when as neighbour princes ſeeke to recouer that which they had vniuſtly wreſted from them, by the Othoman force. So this great eſtate entertained this yeare foure great armies, two at land, the one againſt the Perſians his antient enemie, the other (con-

A (conſiſting in a manner all of Tartarians) againſt the king of Poland, as ſupporting the part of the Vayuod of Moldauia againſt the Turke, who had ſetled another in that Prouince:
And two nauall armies, the one in the Blacke ſea againſt the Coſſackes or Ruſſians, who He entertaines foure armies.
made daily incurſions into the Othomans Countrey, men wholly giuen to armes, which goe to ſea in ſmall boats, able to carrie but fiue or ſix men, made of the bodies of hollow trees; but they are in a manner inuincible with theſe kind of boats: for when as the diſaduantage of a combat forces them to found a retreat, they retire neere vnto the land, and in ſuch places whereas the Turkiſh gallies cannot approch; and ſo they eaſily preuent a totall ouerthrow.
Finally, in caſe of neceſſitie they carrie their veſſels with them. For in the end of the laſt yeare finding the paſſage of the Blacke ſea ſtopped at the mouth of the riuer of Danow B by the Turkiſh gallies, they put their boats into carts, and taking the way by the mountaines, they brought them eaſily into the ſea. The Turkes fourth armie is in the white ſea, as they call it, employed either to conduct the Carauan, which brings the tribute from Ægypt to Conſtantinople, or in ſearch of the gallies of Malta and Florence, which ſcoure thoſe ſeas continually to annoy the Turke. The armie againſt the Perſian is led by Haly Baſſa, ſucceſſor to Mehemet Baſſa, hee who fled into Perſia after that hee had loſt threeſcore thouſand men in a ſet a battell: after which beeing ſent for to come vnto Conſtantinople, fearing that the Sultan would take reuenge of ſo great a loſſe vpon his life, hee retired to the Sophie, where he now remaines.

The Turkes complaine to the Venetians of the Vſcoques ſpoiles. The Turks being much annoyed both at ſea and land by the Vſcoques, made great com-C plaint to the Eſtate of Venice, with whome they are in league, beeing greatly grieued at their theſts; and complayning much that they could not paſſe by ſea without danger of ſeruitude or death: adding withall, that theſe pyrats hauing gotten a way into Turkie by the Venetians territories, they were by them made ſlaues and ſlaine in their owne countries; and although they went not from their houſes, nor vndertooke any voyages, yet they were ſtill in alarme, and ſubiect vnto ruine. That the ſmall reſiſtance which was made, gaue great cauſe of jealouſie, that there was ſome ſecret intelligence betwixt the ſubiects of the Seigniory of Venice and the Vſcoques, and that they diuided the ſpoile betwixt them. Finally, that in what ſort ſoeuer the matter paſt, they held them inſupportable to all men, but eſpecially to themſelues.
The Turkes threatened to take their juſt reuenge, the which beeing impoſſible to effect in D the countrie of the Vſcoques (for that by the letters of the commonwealth of Venice their paſſage was ſtopped) they reſolued to be reuenged vpon their ſubiects, and recouer a part of their goods which they had loſt. Finally, they prepared to come into the gulph of Venice with a mightie armie, the which without doubt had brought that State into great extremities, and been verie preiudiciall to many prouinces of Chriſtendome. But for that the inſolencies and theſts of the Vſcoques had like to haue ingaged the Venetians in a dangerous warre againſt the Turke with whome they were in league, it ſhall neither be vnpleaſant nor vn-profitable to make a little digreſſion, and ſhew what theſe Vſcoques were. About the yeare
The beginning of the Vſcoques. 1550, there aſſembled together in certaine plaines neere the ſea belonging to the princes of the houſe of Auſtria, people (who were cruell, violent, and infamous) from diuers parts of E the countrey of Chimera, Dalmatia, and the other confines of Hungarie, and ſuch as had beene baniſhed from the State of Venice; whoſe delight was onely to liue vpon ſpoyle and bloud. All theſe theeues beeing thus gathered together (whome they called by a generall name Vſcoques) as enemies to all art and induſtrie to liue honeſtly by their labours, retired Enemies to all art and induſtrie.
themſelues into a deſart countrey, receiuing no pay from the Princes of Auſtria who commaunds there. Being thus by their naturall inclination giuen to ſpoyle, adding thereunto the ſpurre of pouertie, nothing mooued them to ſtay in thoſe places, but all libertie was left them to rob and ſpoyle: whereupon they applyed all their mindes and forces; ſo as hauing made certaine light foiſts, they began to make courſes at ſea, with the moſt barbarous and impious cruelrie that euer was practiſed amongſt the Scithians, Tartarians, or any other inhu-F mane Nation whatſoeuer. And for that it is an ordinarie courſe for any one that will commit a great villanie, to ſeeke out ſome goodly pretext to couer it: ſo they concluded among themſelues, to ſhadow their inſolencies and theſts with a colour to goe againſt the Infidels.
Wherefore in the beginning, there were no merchants were they Turkes, Iewes, or ſubiects to the Turke, although they were Christians, but if they entred into the gulfe either to traf- G fique or to furnish Venice with prouision and merchandise, they were taken by them, their goods diuided amongst them, and they forced to pay a great ransome, or to die miserably. All the ports of the State of Venice, both of Istria, Dalmatia, and the Islands from whence they receiued their victuals and prouision, were soone after shut vp by these pyrats, who not content to spoile the Turks (which trafficked no more by reason of their great dangers and losse) allured by the rich spoiles which they tooke, and the desire they had to encounter them, they began to set vpon the Venetian ships, forcing the merchants whom they tooke to confesse by torments, that the goods belonged to Turks, although in effect their chiefe booty came from Christians. Hauing drawn many vnto them of their owne humors, and thinking their spoyles at sea not sufficient to satisfie their couetous desires, nor the presents which they were to giue H to others, to bee faored and supported in the courts of princes, they staied not long before they entered with all violence into the Turkes countrey, through the Venetian territorie, to whom they were as hurtfull as to the Turks; from whence they carried away rich spoiles and many prisoners. There was nothing that was precious, rich, or good, but was subiect to the insatiable greedinesse of those pittileſse theeues and pyrats, if passing by sea they came neere vnto the maritime coasts. Wherupon grew the great complaint you haue heard made by the Turks, threatening to be reuenged vpon the Estate of Venice for the insolencie of the Vscoques, which afterward bred a cruell war, betwixt that State and the Archduke Ferdinand of Grets, now Emperour, who seemed to support them, thereby to ingage the State in a war with the Turke. But for that the succesſe thereof doth not belong to our historie, wee will leaue it to I them that haue written it at large.

Death of Achmat.

On the fifteenth of Nouember this yeare, Sultan Achmat Chan hauing liued 30 yeares, and gouerned that great Empire of Turkie fifteene, died. When he came to the Empire he was but fifteene yeares old; hee was of a good constitution, well complexioned, and somewhat enclined to bee fat, strong and actiue, which appeared by his exercise in casting of a horsemans mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein hee exceeded any one of his Court; in memorie whereof there are two pillars set vp in one of the courts of the Seraglio at Constantinople, with an inscription, as markes of his dexteritie. Hee was by nature ambitious and proud, which some hold qualities befitting his great estate. He was not so cruell as many of his predecessors: but he was much giuen to sensualitie and pleasure; for the which hee entertained K three thousand concubines and virgines in a Seraglio; beeing the faireſt daughters of the Christians. His mother was a Christian of Bosna, or of Cyprus; and therefore it is thought he was somewhat fauorable to Christians. He was much delighted in hawking and hunting; and namely for hawking he kept in Grecia and Natolia fortie thousand faulkoners, who attended his comming, and kept his hawkes in their seuerall places of charge, and had good yearely pensions. Neither were his huntsmen much fewer in number, or of lesse charge. As the Turkish Emperours are bound by the law of their religion once euery day to practise some manuall trade, so Mahomet his father gaue himselfe to the making of arrowes, and Achmat to the fashioning of horne rings, such as the Turkes weare when they draw their bowes: This they doe in the morning, after they are readie and haue said their prayers, then they call L for their exercise, but it is only for forme, for they scarce make an arrow or a ring in a whole yeare.

Nought but Affliction, thundring out of Heauen, makes men of earth to any goodneſſe giuen:
Nor longer than ſhe thunders, any feare that any Heauen holds any Thunderer:
So Muſtapha, while Heauen reſtrain'd his State, and held him fettered in his brothers hate,
To vertuous actions did his ſtudies driue;
was courteous, pious, and contemplatiue:
But when his brother could no longer liue, and Libertie did to him Power giue; Then Pride, and Tyrannie, his horſes were,
and driue him alwaies paſt Heauens Loue or Feare.
Greatneſſe on Goodneſſe, loues to ſlide, not ſtand, and leaues for Fortunes ice, Vertues firme land.
Honour had rather be with danger driuen, than ſtay with Vertue on the hand of Heauen.

THE RAIGNE OF MVSTAPHA, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

Sman the eldeſt ſonne of Achmat, beeing not aboue twelue yeares old, Muſtapha brother to Achmat, being fiue and twentie, was drawne out of a cell where hee liued as it were religiouſly and in contemplation; and proclaimed Sultan Muſtapha Chan. They write of him, that hee grew cruell, cauſing young Oſman to bee kept vnder ſure guards, putting to death his brethren: Hee alſo did many indignities vnto the Chriſtian Embaſſadours; and to confirme him in his Throne, hee gaue great ſummes of money to the Ianizaries and Spahie's; and ſent a meſſenger to Vienna to the Emperour, to aſſure him that hee would maintaine inuiolably whatſoeuer had beene concluded betwixt him and his deceaſed brother Achmat. But growing odious by reaſon of his tyrannie, the Grand Viſier came out of Perſiia with an armie and depoſed him, forcing him to returne to his cell, ſetting prince Oſman at libertie, and ſeating him in the Imperiall Throne. But for that it may ſeeme ſtrange, that Muſtapha ſhould be preſerued aliue during the raigne of his brother Achmat (contrarie to the cuſtome of the Othoman Emperours, who doe vſually kill all their brethren at their firſt comming to the crowne, thinking thereby the better to aſſure their eſtates) it ſhal be fit to make mention thereof. Mahomet the third of that name, dying in the yeare 1602, and leauing Achmat and Muſtapha his ſonnes by the Sultana Flatra a Ladie of Cyprus, ſome ſay of Boſna, Achmat the eldeſt was ſent for ſpeedily out of Magneſia, by the Baſſaes, to take poſſeſſion of his fathers Crowne, beeing the firſt Emperour of that name. And for that the cuſtome of the Turkiſh Emperours was (as wee haue ſaid) to haue neither brother nor nephew aliue, vnleſſe they could ſaue themſelues by flight; yet the Viſier Baſſaes, and other officers of the court concluded in Councell, that it was not fit that Muſtapha brother to Achmat ſhould die; grounding their opinion vpon a good reaſon of State, for that their Emperour beeing but fifteene yeares old, they feared (that dying in his nonage, without children able to gouerne) the Empire might fall into combuſtion, and ruine it ſelfe by reaſon of ciuile wars. Whereupon they decreed, that Muſtapha's life ſhould bee preſerued; but with that caution and reſtriction, that hee ſhould remaine ſtill a priſoner in ſome chambers of the Emperours Seraglio at Conſtantinople.

Muſtapha aduanced to the Empire.

Depoſed againe.

During Achmats minoritie, and before he had children, there was no cruell decree made againſt Muſtapha, but hee onely continued in his contemplation without any libertie: But when as the Emperor ſaw himſelfe fortified with iſſue, and remembring the cruell cuſtome of his predeceſſours, hee many times propounded the putting of his brother to death to his Councell: the which may ſeeme verie ſtrange it tooke not effect, hauing beene often concluded. Among others, it is written that his death was concluded one euening, and that it ſhould G haue beene put in execution the next day: But Achmat was ſo frighted in the night with apparitions and fearefull dreames, as day beeing come, he ſaid, Seeing that the onely reſolu-tion to put his brother to death had ſo terrified him, he did beleeue that his torments would much increaſe if he ſhould put it in execution; and therefore hee commanded his brother ſhould liue, more in regard of the terror of his mind, than for any brotherly affection. Another time Sultan Achmat being in one of the windowes of his Seraiglio, he beheld his brother Mu- ſtapha, who by his permiſſion was walking in the gardens with his guard: Some one of his Baſſaes or other officers that was neere vnto him, and willing to flatter his humour, told him that it was a matter of dangerous conſequence to ſuffer him to haue ſo great libertie. Ach- mat (moued with jealouſie and diſtruſt) grew into rage at his words, whereupon hee ſuddenly H tooke his bow and arrow (beeing a verie expert archer, as all the Turkiſh Nation generally are) and aimed at his brother to kill him; but at that verie inſtant, hee felt ſo great a paine in his arme and ſhoulder, as not able to let looſe his arrow, nor to performe what hee had intended, hee ſaid with a loud voyce, That Mahomet would not haue Muſtapha to die. This prince had three chambers in the Seraglio, where hee remained a priſoner fifteene yeares, and ſpent his time in a contemplatiue kind of life, after the manner of the Muſulmans; his whole delight was to read the Arabian bookes of their doctors in diuers ſciences. The Grand Seig-nior gaue him leaue ſometimes to take the aire of his gardens with his guard, and called him to conſult with him of affaires of eſtate, taking his aduice many times, knowing him to bee of a ſound judgement. I

After a long impriſonment, and a daily apprehenſion of death, the Emperour Achmat falling grieuouſly ſicke in Nouember, as you haue heard, his Baſſaes and other Councellours about him (ſeeing the danger hee was in) perſuaded him to take ſome good courſe for the ſuc-ceſſion of his Empire. Hee had children by the Sultana, but they ſo young as they were not capable to gouern the Empire. Moreouer, this Sultana was dead, and the children left friendleſſe, and none to ſpeake for them. But on the other ſide the Sultana Flatra mother to the Em-perour Muſtapha was yet liuing, who thought that if the Baſſaes ſhould vndertake to gouerne the State during the minoritie of the Emperors children, her honor would be much eclipſed: wherefore ſhe fauored Muſtapha, & perſuaded the dying Emperor to make him his ſucceſſour.
On the 15 of Nouember Achmat ſeeing his end grow neere, he called for his brother, and told K him, that ſeeing death approched, hee deſired to prouide for the preſeruation of the Empire, and therefore had made choice of him to ſucceed him, intreating him to take the gouernment vpon him preſently after his death. Muſtapha was much amaſed at his ſpeech, and anſwered him with words full of feare and humilitie, That he might not accept of the honour which he did him, ſeeing that the Empire did rightly belong vnto his eldeſt ſonne. Achmat diſabled his ſonne for ſo great a gouernement, both for his age and capacitie; beeing neceſſarie for the maintenance of ſo great a monarchie, that hee (who was of ripe yeares and deepe judgement) ſhould take vpon him the mannaging thereof; recommending the Children hee had by the Sultana, vnto him; intreating him to vſe them in the ſame manner that hee had vſed him; leauing the other children which he had by concubines beeing his ſlaues, to his diſcre- L tion. Soone after theſe words, Achmat dyed, and Muſtapha was generally acknowledged for ſucceſſour to the Turkiſh Empire: who at the firſt was ſo amaſed as he thought he had beene in a dreame, to ſee himſelfe aduanced to ſo great a power and ſoueraignetie, from a ſtraight priſon and a daily apprehenſion of death. At his firſt comming to the Empire, he cauſed the Perſian Embaſſadour to be ſet at libertie, whom his brother Achmat had cauſed to be reſtrai-ned contrarie to the publique faith; for that newes came vnto the court of ſome combuſti-ons rayſed by the Perſian. After which hee ſent ſpeedily to the Baſſa of Buda in Hunga-rie, commaunding him to entertaine the treatie of peace made by his predeceſſor with the Emperour inuiolably. Yet notwithſtanding he carried himſelfe during the ſmall time of his raigne inſolently and cruelly; for violating the Laws of Nations, he had ill intreated the ba- M ron of Mole ar Sancie Embaſſadour to the moſt Chriſtian King, ſetting guards vpon him as a priſoner, hauing cauſed his people to be put in priſon, and tortured after their manner. The reaſon of this indignitie which Muſtapha did vnto the French Embaſſador, and to his people, grew

A grew vpon an occaſion which will require an ample diſcourſe; for the better vnderſtanding of that which hath gone before. After the ouerthrow and taking of the Princes of Molda-uia, Prince Coreskie, as you haue heard, was brought by Skinder Baſſa to Conſtantinople; whereat the Grand Seignior was wonderfully well pleaſed, for that he was held (euen by his enemies) for one of the moſt valiant and redoubted princes of Chriſtendome; wherefore hee was ſent away priſoner, and confined to the towers of the blacke ſea, the which are diſtant fiue miles from Conſtantinople; a place appointed for the guard of priſoners of great qualitie and importance, ſuch as hee was. Hee was ſhut vp with a French Captaine called Rigaut, in a little Chamber which was on the top of one of thoſe towers, in which chamber there was a window capable for a man to paſſe through, and yet it had no barres for that the B height of the place freed it from all ſuſpition. This prince was much ſolicited by the Turke to become a Renegado, as the Princes Alexander and Bougdan his brothers in law had done; but hee reſiſted it with a generous reſolution, reſoluing rather to die in that tedious captiuity, The generous reſolution of prince Coreskie.
than to commit ſo baſe an act againſt God and his conſcience: The which beeing made knowne vnto the King of Polonia, it mooued him to compaſſion, and made him write to the French Embaſſadour, and to entreat him to bee a meanes that this prince might be put to ranſome, and freed from captiuitie, at what price ſoeuer; the which the Embaſſador durſt not vndertake, although hee deſired it much, for that hee had no charge from the King his Maſter. The Emperours Embaſſadour did what poſſibly hee could, knowing how much the libertie of this prince might be auaileable to Chriſtendome: For which conſiderations, C the Turke would not yeeld in any ſort to ſuffer him to be releaſed; ſo as the friends of this captiue prince were out of hope euer to ſee him at libertie. But moſt commonly in ſuch extremities the Almightie workes by the ſecret inſtruments of his Diuine prouidence, and giues aſſiſtance vnto them that feare him, when as all humane helpe and hope failes, as you may vnderſtand in the ſequell of this hiſtorie: whence grew the Embaſſadours affront which he receiued.

About the ſame time, there had beene a Ladie taken out of Podolia with a faire young daughter of hers and a maid ſeruant, by the Tartarians, who ſould them vnto a Turke; and hee brought them vnto Conſtantinople to make his profit. This Ladie who was a Chriſtian, hearing nothing from her husband for the ſpace of nine moneths, went accor-D panied with her daughter to the French Embaſſadours houſe which was at Pera, to craue his aid and aſſiſtance; where his Secretarie (who was called Martine) mooued with com-paſſion and loue, promiſed vnto them all ſeruice, and afterwards aſſured the mother, that if ſhee would promiſe hee ſhould marrie her daughter, hee would endeauour to redeeme them from captiuitie: whereunto the Ladies yeelded, and they paſſed their promiſe in writing to the Secretarie; whereupon he payed two thouſand and fiue hundered crowns for their ranſome, and ſent them home into their countrey. Being returned, the Ladie made her husband and the reſt of her friends acquainted how they had beene freed from captiuitie; and of the contract of marriage which was paſt betweene her daughter and the French Embaſſadours Secretarie; but the father did altogether diſlike of this marriage, for that E Martine, hee ſaid, was no Gentleman, and had not an eſtate to entertaine his daughter according to her qualitie. The mother aduertiſed Martine ſoone after of the fathers refu-ſall; proteſting vnto him, that he alone was the hinderance: and as for the mony which hee had diſburſed for their ranſome, they would ſend it vnto him if hee pleaſed to Conſtantinople with intereſt. Martine was much diſcontented, and diuers Letters and expoſtulations paſt betwixt them, but he could not obtaine the execution of his deſire, and their promiſe; whereupon he grew full of griefe and melancholie, and thereupon went to viſite prince Co- reskie who was in the Blacke Tower, to make his complaint vnto him, and to take his aduice what courſe were beſt for him to follow: Hee made his excuſe that hee had been ſent by his maſter to carrie the prince ſome money, as he had done at other times, who making the prince F acquainted with his diſcontent (for that he knew theſe Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the ſuit which he had made to this virgin) hee comforted him, ſaying, That if he might by any meanes get out of priſon, hee would willingly ſupplie the defects which they ob-iected againſt him, and would maintaine him againſt all that ſhould oppoſe themſelues againſt his

Osman, thy gentle Nature farre declinde from Turkish tyrannie and pride of minde, Which made heauen raise thee and extirpat them,
the proud vsurpers of thy Diadem.
O! would all Princes (when their States are blest with Power, and Empire) thinke their interest In those their blessings, held but by the grace of Gratitude, and Goodnesse; and no place Is held without them long: they soone would try, that Truth preuailes past all their Policie.

OSMAN THE FIRST OF that name, tenth Emperour of the Turks, he that now swaieth that mightie Empire.

C P Rince Osman beeing set at libertie by the graund Visier, hee caused him to bee proclaimed Sultan, and seated in the Imperiall throne of the Othomans, with the generall applause of all the Bassaes and armie. The French Embassadour beeing by the same meanes freed from his guard, aduertised the King his Master, how barbarously hee had beene entreated by Mustapha, entreating his Maiestie to reuoke him from that charge. Whereupon the King sent two Gentlemen to Constantinople to the new Emperor Osman, to demand reparation of the indignitie done vnto his Embassador and Secretarie; and to let him vnderstand, that hee could not send any other Embassadour to his Court to condole the death of Sultan Achmat his father, nor congratulate his comming to the East, vntill that hee had receiued satisfaction from him befitting his dignitie, and the wrongs hee had receiued in his Embassador. The Grand Visier and the Muphti hearing this Embassie, and considering of the actions which had passed, aduised the Emperor Osman to send an Embassadour to the most Christian King, to confirme their league, and to testifie both by word and letters how much he was displeased for his discontent. 1618

The French king sendeth to Constantinople.

The Grand Seignior by the aduice of his Visier and others, sent Vri Chiaus into France. The Turk sendeth an Embassadour into France. to confirme the articles of peace betwixt the French and the Turks. At his first audience he presented a letter vnto his Maiestie with this superscription.

E To the most glorious and puissant Prince of the Beleefe of Iesus, arbitrator of all the differences which happen among the Christian Nations, and of all the most noble, and the most antient, the Emperour of France, to whom we wish the end of his daies to be happie, and his desires accomplished.

Know, that I send vnto you the capitulations and treaties of peace which are betweet our [illegible] giuing you to vnderstand, that there is not any thing firme or stable in this world [illegible] gar although they liue long: that which pleaseth God cannot fayle. [illegible] without doubt all men would goe to heauen. Man whatsoeuer he doe [illegible] be, shall not remaine in this fraile life; wise men know it, and it is [illegible]

F which we haue said, wee desire to let you know, that he who was in [illegible] gone to a goodlier place, to Paradise, my father Sultan Achmat [illegible] blance haue mercy on him. No man shal remaine in this lying [illegible] to God, where there is no death. Finally he is gone.

Since the beginning of the Othomans vntil this present [illegible] from father and sonne, from hand to hand, and from father to sonne, the inheritance comming so vnto G vs; our Vncle Sultan Mustapha Chan, for that he was elder than our selfe, was preferred before vs to the throne of the Otromans, and was some daies in peaceable possession of the Empire, yeelding justice equally to all men both great and small. But as he was shut vp many yeares in secret places, praying vnto God continually; so of himselfe he hath relinquished the dignitie of the Emperor, and contem-ned it. The Empire then belonging to those of our high linage, and for that by right it should come vnto me, the Almightie God by his infinit bountie and mercy hath restored it into my hands, my Visiers, Bassaes, Lieutenants, the Musti, and other great personages, and they that are in any respect with me: and finally, all my subiects and vassals, by a generall consent haue acknowledged me for Emperor, in the happy yeare 1027. About the first day of the Moone of Ianuarie, in a good houre. Wherefore I am seated in H the great throne of the Othomans, like vnto that of Salomon, a powerfull and able Emperour, and in all our countries and cities: All the Musulmans being assembled together in their churches to preach, the greatnesse of my name hath beene proclaimed, and through all the mints of mine Empire they haue grauen it in their stamps, to coine pieces of gold and siluer. Finally, wheresoener there are any Musul-mans, and in what places there are men, my name shines like gold. Heereafter iniustice nor impietie shall haue no place, but iustice shall be done equally. Now we are in ioy and for that our naturall disposition is good, and the ancient freindship betwixt vs is perfect, I therefore thought good to aduertise you of all that hath passed here, and to send you our letters of Imperial alliance by Vieiu Chiaus who is my antient seruant, hauing had the managing of my treasure, whereof hee hath given me good account, being arri-ued at your court, carrying my said letter, hee deserues to be receiued with honour: swearing and protesting againe vnto you, to obserue in all points the full capitulation made betwixt my predecessors, and I your great grandfathers, and for our part, you may be assured, that the faith promised shal be maintained as it hath been heretofore by our predecessors. And from the day I entered into my throne, I haue made my will knowne to all my Viceroyes, and other officers which do my Iustice, and generally to all those of my obedience; intreating you to giue the like commandement to your Gouernours of prouinces, and other officers of Iustice, as in like manner to all your subiects. And as your grandfathers haue taken the faith of our high family, so it may please you to continue with me, and we desire that on both sides it may bee good and firme. Know then that for my part it shall be obserued, so as of your side, there be nothing done contrarie to the promised faith. And if before we came vnto the Imperiall throne, your Embassadour which did your affaires hath receiued any distaste, and hath not receiued the honor and frienaship accu- K stomed, in my time he shall be the more honored and respected as the chiefest Embassadors haue beene: I haue commanded that he shall be greatly fauored, and our respect shall be vnto him as Quineo, that is to say, Gold, and doubt nothing of it: for I doe certifie you.

The French king hauing receiued by this relation a full satisfaction for the indignitie done vnto his Embassador: soon after he called the Baron of Mole or Sancie home into France, sending the Earle of Sezi to succeed him as Embassador at Constantinople.

Abattell betwixt the Turks and the Persians.

The war continuing still betwixt the Turkes and the Persians, the grand Visier was sent to inuade Persia with a great armie, where after many exploits of war, newes came to Constantinople, that the Visier had gotten a great aduantage vpon the Sophy of Persia in a battel which L had beene fought, wherein there had been 100000 men slaine. And although the Turks lost the greatest number, yet they remained masters of the fielde, and spoiled the Persians campe, who was retired or fled. For that the manner of the Sophie is to fight with the Turks in retiring or giuing way a little; and with this manner of fighting they haue alwaies made head against the Turks. After this ouerthrow the Visier aduanced with his armie, and entred far into Persia, which made many doubt that his returne would proue difficult: yet soone after there came letters to Constantinople, importing that the Turkes being in Persia in great distresse for victuals, the Sophie had sent an Embassador to the Visier to demand peace, promising hereafter to satisfie the tributes of silkes which he ought yerely vnto the Turke; and that the Visier A peace concluded betwixt them. (in regard of the necessitie of his armie) had accepted his offer, and graunted him peace, the which Sultan Osman did afterwards ratifie. After the conclusion whereof, the Sophie sent M many Cammels loaden with victuals vnto the Turkes armie, which was in great distresse and want.

A comet seene ouer Constantinople.

During the Turkes warre in Persia, vpon the anniuersarie day of Sultan Achmat, there appeared in the night a Comet ouer the Citie of Constantinople; in forme like vnto a crooked

A crooked sword, or Turks scimiter: and it was so great, as it extended from the meridian neere vnto our zenith, vnto the horizon: the point began to shew it selfe an houre after midnight, and then it appeared little and somewhat whitish, and gaue but a glimpse, after an houre it was more apparent and of a deeper color, and the more it did rise, the redder it was, and like vnto bloud; but at the breake of day it vanished by little and little in the light: And it was so big when the point approched neere vnto the zenith, as the hilt was hidden vnder the horizon; the Mathematicians did obserue, that it followed the motions of the heauens; it did alwayes rise in one place, and the bending of the said sword was toward Crates, more Southerly than it. It did appeare directly in the East a quarter towards the South, the point comming directly towards Constantinople, and the blade extending it selfe to the said East a quarter to the
B South, which is justly the part where Persia is scituated. The edge looked directly towards Constantinople, the which made men discourse diuersly, and many were amased, fearing that it did signifie the losse and defeat of their armie in Persia, whose returne they feared much.

Vri or Husseine Chiaus hauing finished his Embassie in France, came into England with the like charge, and had audience from his Majesty at White Hall, Sir Thomas Glouer being Interpreter, from whom I receiued a true discourse of his whole speech, as followeth.

The Turkish Embassadors speech to his Maiestie.

The Interpretation hereof is thus.

That most true, incomprehensible, and most high God, encrease and multiply your Maiesties yeares in E all happinesse and felicitie, amen oh thou Lord of the world.

The most inuincible, most mightie, and most happie Sultan Osman Chan of the Othoman Empire, Monarch, sendeth vnto your excellent Maiestie a hundred thousand salutations and greetings, euermore praying the most high God for your Maiesties happinesse, sendeth vnto your Highnesse with all possible honor and renown, this his Imperiall and most noble Letter; and withall hopeth, that the sacred bond of peace, which hath beene hitherto inuiolable on your maiesties parts kept and obserued; your Maiestie will be well pleased still on your part, with daily encrease more and more of friendship, earnestly to continue therein. And his Imperiall Maiestie on his behalfe is also resolued in the like manner euermore punctually to keepe and obserue the same.

Also the most mightie Emperour his Tutor, and his chiefe Visier Bassa, hath addressed to the dust of F of your noble feet, this his most honorable letter, with a thousand commendations, praying euerlastingly that mightie God for your Maiesties long life and happinesse.

Also your Maiesties Embassadour at Constantinople, your slaue Paul Pinder, bowing his forehead to the dust of your Maiesties feet, and most humbly kissing your Highnesse blessed feet, hath directed vnto your Majestie this his submissiue Letter.

The Interpretation verbatim is thus. H

Most happie Emperor, as I haue with mine owne hands, bowing my selfe to the dust of your princely feet appresented vnto your excellent Maiestie the most mightie and high Sultan Othoman my lord and Master his Imperiall Letter, so likewise I most humbly beseech your Maiestie, that you will be pleased in conformitie thereof, to vouchsafe your princely answer by your noble Letter, and to deliuer the same into the hands of me your slaue: and be euer partaker of all blessednesse and happinesse.

A Copie of the Letter of Sultan Osman the present Othoman Emperour, written to the Kings Maiestie, and presented by Hussaine Chiaus. I

Although in this transitorie world, if the king or the beggar should enioy the longest terme of life that might be, and obtaine all that his heart could wish, yet it is most certaine, that in the end hee must depart and be transported to the world eternall; and it is well known vnto the wise, that it is impossible for man to abide for euer in this world. The occasion of this prologue is, that the Immortall, omnipotent, and onely God hath by his Diuine will and pleasure called vnto himselfe our father of blessed memorie Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happie, and in death laudable; and departing out of this momentarie world to be neerer the mercifull Creatour, being changed into perfect glorie, and eternall blisse, hath his habitation on high, and his rest in Paradise. This paternall Empire and Monarchicall kingdome hath almost vntill this present blessed time, beene alwayes hereditarie, from grandfather to father, from father to sonne, and so cursiuely on that manner; but hauing regard vnto the age and yeares of our great and noble Vncle Mustapha, hee was preferred and honored to sit on the Othoman Throne, and being setled for some time, tooke care for the affaires of the Empire, and for all that might concerne the people both in generall and particular. But he hauing been many yeares retired in solitarinesse, and giuen to deuotion and Diuine obedience, being also as it were wearied with the cares of the Empire, of his owne accord withdrew himselfe from the gouernment; for that the Diademe and Scepter of the Empire of the seuen Climats, was the true right and inheritance of our most excellent Maiestie, of the which with the meeting and consent of all the Visiers, and other deputies of State, of the Primat of the Mussulman Law, and of the other honourable Doctors, of the souldiers, and of all subiects both publike and priuate, the Almightie God hath made an high Present and worthy gift vnto vs. And in the happie day in the beginning of the Moone Rebea-il-euel of this present yeare 1027, in an expected time, and in an acceptable houre, was our blessed and happie sitting established vpon the most fortunat Othoman Throne, the seat and wisedome of Salomon. In the pulpits of all the Mosques (the congregations of the faithfull and deuotion of the Mussulmen) throughout all our dominions is read to our imperiall name the * Hutbeh. And in the mints (where innumerable summes of money are coined, as well vpon the siluer as the gold) our happie name and stampe is signed. And our most powerful commandements are obeyed in all the parts and dominions of the world: And the brightnesse of the light of the Sunne of Iustice and equitie, hath caused the darknesse of iniuries and molestations to vanish away.

* Hutbeh is a prayer only for the prosperitie of the king.

Now seeing it hath been an ancient custome of our famous Predecessors to giue notice of the same vnto such Princes as are in sincere friendship, and do continue it with the House of great Maiestie and our Imperiall Court: Wee also haue written these our princely letters, and appointed for their Bearer the choice among his equals Hussaine Chiaus (whose power is great) one of the honoured and respected seruants M

A seruants of our magnificent Port, the refuge of the World, to the end that such newes might cause great ioy of our most honourable assumption. And wee doe hope that when they shall come to your hands (in conformitie of the well grounded friendship vpon the sure league, articles, and writings which hath been established of old with our most royall Race, and permanent Empire) you will manifest infinite ioy and gladnesse, and certifie as much to the Rulers and Gouernours of the dominions and Countries vnder you, that they may know that the articles of peace and league, and the points of the oath which are firme and

And let there not bee the least imagination of any want of due obseruance of the signes of friendship on our part, or by any manner of meanes on your part, for the violating the foundation of the peece and league.*

The Copie of a Letter written by Halil Bassa, chiefe Visier, and Generall in the expedition against the Persian, at his returne from the warres, to the Citie of Senit in Aprill 1618, vnto Sir Paul Pinder Knight, then Embassadour for the Kings Majestie at Constantinople.

The humble Visier Halil Bassa.

To the courteous Lord of the Nation of the Messiah, both great and honourable among the people of
C Iesus, and the true determiner of Christian affaires; our good friend Paul Pinder, the English embassador whose latter daies be with all felicitie. To whose noble presence (after our many kind salutations tending to all good affection and manifestation of ioy, worthy and beseeming our friendship) our louing aduice is this, That if you desire to heare of our estate and being, you shall vnderstand, that after wee departed from the happie port with the armie for the wars of Asia, we arriued and wintered in Mesopotamia, and remouing thence in the Spring with all the Mussulman hoste (alwaies victorious) we went to Van, from which place vntill we came to Tauris, the Mussulman armie went on alwaies sacking and destroying all those places and townes of the Persians which wee met withall by the way in those parts, where were burnt, pillaged, and ruined, some thousands of villages, and tormenting all those people that came to hand. And when wee were come neere to Tauris, the Generall of the Persian forces (of D peruerse religion) called Carelghai Han (the accursed) retired himselfe into the said Tauris, where beating vp his drummes in euerie quarter, he made a shew that he had a will to fight, so we sent a little before vs some Tartars and others of our armie to bearken out and take notice of the enemie; who meeting with 7 or 8 hundred Persians of note, put them to the sword, very few escaping, and that with verie great difficultie and hazard. By which the said Generall finding himselfe vnable to resist the power and furie of the Mussulman host, or to stay any longer in the said place, the verie same day that we arriued there, the said Generall hauing spoiled all the Citie, fled away; so we tooke the place, ransacked it, and burned all the buildings, towers, gardens, and whatsoeuer else we found within it: And thus the great citie Tauris by Diuine fauour and grace became ours. Then forthwith we sent after the enemy, the Tartar with some Beglerbegs, who ouertaking them gaue them battell; and albeit some of ours did fall,
E yet they which fell on the enemies side were innumerable. And so going forward towards Erdeuil (their obscure residence) about ten daies journey of country, we went burning and spoyling it, and killing all the Persians that we met; that indeed there was so much glorie and honor won, as that all the antient men of the country do affirme, there was neuer seene the like; insomuch, that from the confines vnto Erdeuil, 20 daies journey of countrey was on that manner by vs destroied. Thus afterward the king caused to emptie the said place of Erdeuill, and fled into a place called Hulchal, and caused his armie to goe to the top of a high mountaine, from whence hauing sent 3 or 4 times men of qualitie vnto vs, seeking and entreating for peace, with promise to giue yearely to our Emperour 100 Somes of silke, and all such places as are vpon the confines gotten in the time of Sultan Solyman, except Der Ne and Der Tink; wherewith we were contented with the peace and his Embassadour is vpon the way comming toward vs.
F And so we returning the same way againe (alwaies spoyling) wee came to Erzirum. And this our present letter is written vnto you for the respect and preseruation of our friendship: and euen as our amitie hath euer been hitherto sincere and firme, so likewise by the Grace of God at our arriuall in the happie Port, it shall be in like manner maintained and continued, that more cannot possible be. And so God keepe you in health.

Bethlem Gabor takes many townes in Hungarie.

Soone after, the Prince of Transyluania came to Presburg with his armie, a towne of ... in Hungarie, whereas their kings are vsually crowned. The newes thereof comming to Vienna, they sent 3000 souldiers with three pieces of ordnance downe the riuer of Danow, who entred the suburbs on the 13 of October, the night was very stormy and rainie, and the Transyluanians taking this opportunitie charged them, and slew the greatest part, their Commander flying away with some few. The suburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor sent to the Palatine, to know whether he would yeeld the towne and castle without force, giuing him some time to resolue; who after consultation with some noblemen, they resolued to yeeld, and so the town was deliuered into his hands. After which he sent part of his army vnder good Commanders into Austria, to the gates of Vienna, where they committed great spoile, the particular relation whereof I leaue to the Historie of the Emperors liues, to which it doth properly belong.

Propositions made by the Transyluanians & Hungarians to the Bohemians.

In November Bethlem Gabor prince of Transyluania, and the Estates of Hungarie, sent Embassadors to Prague, where they propounded diuers articles vnto the Councell, and amongst others, That they should joyntly send Embassadors to the Grand Seignior, & that the prince of Transyluania should negotiate the businesse. And for that the kingdome of Hungarie was much exhausted, whatsoeuer should be taken in Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, should be vnited vnto it, to the end it might be the better able to resist the Turke: all which tended to the prejudice and ruine of the house of Austria. The Prince of Transyluania hauing taken diuers townes in Hungarie, belonging to the Emperor as king of Hungarie, and entred Austria in hostile manner in fauor of the Bohemians, knowing that he had thereby much incensed the Emperor, and the whole house of Austria, and that if he should preuaile ouer the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the warre would lie vpon him, hee therefore in the end of this yeare sent an Embassadour with presents to Constantinople, to craue assurance of the Graund Seignors aid and support (vpon whose fauour he had alwaies depended) in case the Emperor should inuade Transyluania: where being countenanced by many of the chiefe Bassaes, he had assurance of Sultan Osman his support and protection, the which he confirmed by a solemne oath vnder his hand, as followeth:

The Great Turkes Oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transyluania.

Sultan Osman,

By the grace of God vnconquerable Turkish Emperour, sweares by the Highest, Almightiest, and Almightie Goas Holinesse by his Kingdome, by the substance of the Heauens, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, by the earth, and by all vnder the earth, by the braines and all the harie scalpe of my mother, by my head, and all the strength of my soule and bodie, by the holy great Mahomet, and by my circumcision, That I thee my brother and sonne Bethlem Gabor, succeeding King of Hungarie, in no manner of way, in thy great and weightie affaires will leaue, though it be to the ouerthrow of my Kingdome, to be brought to nothing, vntill there shall bee no more left but my selfe, or foure or fiue Turkes at the most, yet will I be still obliged to defend thee, and all those that doe any wayes appertaine vnto thee. And if thou shalt haue need of mee, I will be alwaies readie to goe with thee. And in case this my promise shall in any wise be frustrated, then let Goas Iustice fall vpon my head and destroy me and my posteritie, and wipe away whatsoeuer belongeth vnto mee, and gather it together into a rocke of stone, or substance of earth, and that the earth may cleaue a sunder and swallow mee vp bodie and soule.

Dated at Constantinople the fifth of Ianuarie, 1619.

I

Bethlem Gabor being assured by this oath, of protection made by the Graund Seigniour, in the beginning of the yeare 1620, hee called an assemblie of the Estates of Hungarie at Presbourg, whither Embassadours were sent from the King of Bohemia, and the States of that Countrey, which the incorporated Prouinces, where a perpetuall league was concluded betwixt them, and afterwards concluded at Prague; where among other articles, it was concluded, that forasmuch as necessitie did chiefely require, that a peace should bee concluded and inuiolably kept with the Turke, therefore a new Embassie should be sent to the Graund Seigniour from all the confederate Kingdomes and Prouinces; and that Bethlem Gabor should take vpon him the chiefe care of that businesse; but yet in such sort, as the Bohemians and incorporated Prouinces should send their Embassadours with the Hungarians, and beare their shares of all that should bee disbursed, as wel for the Presents, as for the Embassadors charges.

1620

A league betwixt the prince of Transyluania, Bohemians, & Hungarians.

An assembly of the Estates of Hungarie at Neuheusall.

In Iune following, Bethlem Gabor went to an assemblie of the Estates of Hungarie at Neuheusall, where he propounded diuers heads vnto the States: That hee desired nothing more than to restore the Kingdome of Hungarie, so miserably afflicted, to libertie; and that they might enjoy their Religion and priuiledges: That he had spared no cost for the lawfull defence of the countrey; and for a testimonie that he desired peace, he had refused the Crowne which the Estates offered him at Presburg: That the ground of peace was to maintaine the league which they had begun with the Bohemians: That he had alwaies desired peace with the helpe of other Princes, so as it were sincere and without fraud or deceit, for the obtaining whereof hee had assisted his confederates miserably afflicted: That he knew for certaine the Emperor desired not peace but war, hauing suffered the Cossackes to enter into Hungarie, and to spoile many places with fire and sword, and denied passage for the Embassadors of Bohemia and Austria; for this cause they were not now to treat of peace but of war, and to consult how it might be begun and maintained: for the leuying of money which is the sinewes of warre: for the furnishing of their forts vpon the frontiers, and for the speedie sending of Embassadours to the Turkish Emperour, lest beeing engaged in an inestine warre, there might be some attempts made vpon those bordering forts. Hauing deliuered his minde vnto the Estates, there came diuers Embassadours thither from Bohemia, Austria, Silesia, and Lusatia, Venice, Poland, and Turkie: The Venetian Embassadour was content their Commonwealth should enter into the league, and the Turke made offer to conclude a perpetuall league with them.

On

Mahomet Celebi proclaimed King of Hungarie.

On the first and twentieth day of August Mahomet Celebi prince of Transylvania was proclaimed King of Hungarie by the Palatine in the absence of the Turkish Embassador, and with the ancient and publicke of most part of the Estates of the countrey. After which he hasted a great armie of Hunnic horse and foot, and made many Bridges and fitted Emblemes and armes; which being knowne, the Ambassadors of Vienna, with the consent of the Emperour, wrote vnto him, humbly requiring him to spare the Citie and Countrey, for their innocent wiues and children sakes: but in the meane vnwell the citizens were commanded to make prouision of victuals for five moneths.

Mahomets tombe at Medina Talnain.

There came newes to Constantinople of a strange apparition or vision, which was seene at Medina Talnain in Arabia, wherein Mahomet their great Prophet was buried: to the whole tombe the Turkes vse to goe in pilgrimage, but they must first goe to Mecha, which is some few daies journey off, and there they take a ticket from the Grand Seignior Beglerbeg, else they are not allowed to goe to Medina. This vision continued three weekes together, which terrified the whole countrey, for that no man could discouer the truth thereof. About the twentieth of September, there fell so great a tempest, and so fearefull a thunder about midnight, as the heauens were darkened, and those that were awake, almost distracted; but the vapours being dispersed, and the element cleare, the people might read in Arabian Characters these words in the firmament, O why will you beleeue in lies? Betweene two and three in the morning, there was seene a woman in white compassed about with the Sunne, hauing a cheerefull countenance, and holding in her hand a booke: comming from the Northwest, opposite against her were armies of Turkes, Persians, Arabians, and other Mahometanes, ranged in order of battell, and readie to charge her; but shee kept her standing, and onely opened the booke, at the sight whereof these armies fled; and presently all the lampes about Mahomets tombe went out; for as soone as euer the vision vanished (which was commonly an houre before sunne rising, a murmuring winde was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguishing of the lampes. The antient pilgrims of Mahomets race, who after they haue visited this place neuer vse to cut their haire, were much amased, for that they could not conceiue the meaning of this vision: onely one of the Deruices (which is a strict religious order amongst the Turkes, like vnto the Capuchins among the Papists, and liue in contemplation) stepped vp verie boldly, and made a speech vnto the companie, which incensed them much against him, so as this poore priest for his plaine dealing lost his life, as you shall heare.

A Deruice speech vnto the Turkes.

The summe of his speech was this: That the world had neuer but three true religions, euerie one of which had a Prophet; first God chose the Iewes, and did wonders for them in Ægypt, and brought them forth by their Prophet Moses, who prescribed them a Law, wherein he would haue maintained them, if they had not beene obstinat and rebellious, and fallen to Idolatrie: whereupon hee gaue them ouer, and scattered them vpon the face of the earth. Then presently after he raised a new Prophet, who taught the Christian Religion. This good man the Iewes condemned and crucified for a seducer of the people, not moued with the pietie of his life, his great myracles, nor his doctrine. Yet after his death, the preaching of a few fishermen, did so moue the hearts of men, as the greatest Monarchs of the world bowed to his verie title, and yeelded to the command of his ministers. But it seemes they grew as corrupt as the Iewes, their Church being dismembred with the distinction of the East and West, committing Idolatrie again by setting vp of Images, with many other idle ceremonies, besides the corruption of their liues, so as God was wearie of them too, and not onely sent diuisions among them, but forsooke them, dispossessing them of their chiefest cities Hierusalem and Constantinople: yet God is still the Gouernor of the World, and prouides himselfe of another Prophet and people, raising our great Mahomet, and giuing way to our nation, so as no doubt wee shall be happie for euer, if we can serue this God aright, and take example by the fall of others. But ahlas! I tremble to speake it, wee haue erred in euerie point, and wilfully broken our first institutions, so as God hath manifested his wrath by euident signes and tokens, keeping our Prophet from vs, who prefixed a time to returne with all happinesse to his people, so as there are now fortie yeares past by our account: Wherefore this strange and fearefull vision is a prediction of some great troubles and alterations.

For

A For either the opening of this booke in the womans hand, doth foretell our falling away » from the first intent of our law, whereat these armed men departed as confounded with the » guilt of their own consciences; or else it signifies some other booke in which we haue not yet » read, and against which no power shall preuaile: so as I feare our religion will be proued cor» rupt, and our Prophet an Impostor, and then this Christ whom they talke of, shall shine like » the sunne, and set vp his name euerlastingly. Hitherto the companie was silent, but hearing him speake so boldly, they charged him with blasphemie, & knowing their law, which makes all blasphemie capitall, they presently condemned him, and hauing the Beglerbegs consent and warrant, they put him to death.

The Deruice put to death for his speech.

As their rage against him was violent, so their execution was extraordinarie, for they nei-
B ther cut off his head nor strangled him, as they vsually doe to malefactors, but they tortured him by degrees: for stripping him first naked, they gaue him a hundred blowes on the soles of his feet with a flat cudgell, vntill the bloud issued forth, the poore priest crying continually on the woman that opened the booke. After which they tooke a bulls pizzell, and beat all his bodie vntil his sinewes crackt, and in the end they laid him vpon a wheele, and with an Indian sword made of sinews, they brake his bones to pieces, the poore man crying to the last gaspe, O thou woman with the booke, saue mee, and so he died: At which time there was a fearefull tempest. The Beglerbeg sent certaine Spahis to the port of Sidon to imbarke for Constantinople, to the end they might aduertise the Emperour of these tidings.

Sultan Osman from the first entrance into his raigne was freed from all cares of forraine C warre, or intestine combustions; for he had that happinesse (being himselfe very yong, and not able to gouerne so potent an estate) as by the counsell and assistance of Halil Bassa his grand Visier, hee had forced the king of Persia to demaund a peace, and to pay the tribute which had bin formerly promised. His rebels in Asia were all pacified, and the truce with the Em-perour (which had beene somewhat interrupted by misinterpretation, or the practise of bad ministers) was newly confirmed a little before his comming to the crowne, onely Moldauia had beene the theatre of warre for some yeares, where his father had exercised his armes, and imployed his forces, to aduance whome he pleased to be Vayuod of that Countrey, against another partie that was supported by the Polonians, as you haue formerly heard. Michna prince of Valachia, being made Vayuod of Moldauia by Achmat, and the Polonian par-D tie wholly ouerthrowne in the yeare one thousand six hundred and sixteene, hee enioyed it not long: but whether he died of a naturall death, or fell into disgrace with the grand Seig-nior, I doe not read: yet I finde that after him there was another Vayuod or prince of Mol-dauia, who is yet liuing, but in disgrace with the Sultan, his name is Casparo Gratiani: and to the end you may vnderstand, that the Turkes neuer respect the birth and qualitie of any man in their aduancements, I will relate what this man was, from the mouth of him that knew him verie well.

This Casparo was borne at Gretz (a Towne of great strength belonging vnto the Archdukes of Austria, by the which a branch of that house is distinguished from the E rest) and whereof the Emperour now raigning is the head) but beeing a man of small fortune, and little expectance in his owne countrey, hee went to Constantinople, and put himselfe in seruice with Sir Thomas Glouer, before that hee was Embassadour for his Maiestie to the Grand Seignior, vnder whom he learned both to write and read the Turkish tongue. After which hee came with him into England, and there by his recommendation was employed to Constantinople for the redeeming of young Sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a prisoner among the Turkes. Hauing performed his charge orderly, and beeing come to Venice with the young Knight, hearing that Sir Thomas Glouer was sent Embas-sadour to the Graund Seignior, he left Sir Thomas Sherley, and went to Constantinople to his old master, where he was emploied yerely to buy or exchange Christians for Turks, carrying F the Christians into Italie, and so returning Turkes for them. About the end of Achmats raigne arriuing at Constantinople with a ship full of Turkes, which he had exchanged, hee acquainted the Bassa Visier with the good seruice he had done vnto the Grand Seignior; who demanding of what countrey he was and his breeding, asked him if he would vndertake a seruice which should be for his aduancement, which was to goe vnto the Emperour to reconcile all difficulties concerning the peace, wherein he carried himselfe so discreetly, as Commissioners were appointed, who concluded all difficulties, as you haue heard. But before his returne home, the Grand Seignor was dead; yet hee pressed the Bassa for the performance of his promise, desiring him, that hee might bee made Vayuod of Moldauia, which the Bassa effected: but the presents he gaue aduanced him more than his merits. Since hee grew into some disgrace; so as the Graund Seigniour making choice of another Vayuod, gaue charge to certaine Capigis, to go into Moldauia to strangle Gasparo, and that they should take foure hundred Turkes vpon the frontiers to assist them: But Gasparo hauing good spies at Constantinople, who aduertised him of their designe, resolued to preuent them; wherefore taking some troupes with him, hee met them vpon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to Yas, hee slew one thousand Turkes. After which he fled into Poland with two thousand horse; from whence they write that he hath made diuers incursions into Moldauia, and committed great spoiles vpon the Turkes, being assisted by the Cossackes, and keepes possession of the countrie, although there bee another Vayuod made by the Turke.

Gasparo made Vayuod of Moldauia.

He is in disgrace and flies into Polonia.

The Turks preparation to armes.

Sultan Osman seemes to be much incensed against the Polonians, as well for this support, as for former quarrells, making it his colour for the leuying of the greatest armie that hath been seene since that Solyman went vnto the siege of Agria, consisting, as it is said, of three hundred thousand men, hauing drawne down all his forces out of Asia. God knowes where he will imploy it, but it is much to be feared that he will make vse of this diuision betwixt Christian princes, who should vnite their willes and forces, to oppose them against the common enemie of Christendome, who watcheth only to get an aduantage, little regarding his word and promise.

Manfredonia taken by the Turks.

The Turke hauing no imployment for his forces by land, sent three score gallies to sea, to make some enterprise vpon the Christians. They came into the Mediterranean sea, and hauing coasted the Island of Sicile, they sent twentie gallies to land in the kingdome of Naples, where they surprised the towne of Manfredonia, and spoiled it, carrying away foureteene or fifteene hundred captiues, and so retyred againe to sea. The rest of their fleet lay about Vellona in the gulfe, which made the Spaniards iealous that the Venetian had been acquainted with this enterprise. And since there is newes, that the Gallions and Galliots of Algiers, haue taken Iuisa, a small Island of foure miles compasse, neere vnto Maiorca: It is a place of great importance, for that it hath a hauen able to containe much shipping; for the gard whereof the king of Spaine entertaines a great garrison, and it did much annoy them of Algiers. They tooke the towne; but it is not yet certaine whether they haue taken the castle.

Iuisa taken by the Turkes.

The greatnesse of the Turkes Empire.

This is all I could learne of the Turkes affaires since the yere 1609 vntill this present. The reader may obserue, that since the raigne of Ottoman their first Emperor, this great empire of the Turkes, is proudly built vpon the foure monarches of the world; that is to say, of the Assirian, Persian, Greeke, and Romane. For they enioy Babylon, aad all Chaldæ, with the countrie of the Medes: We haue seene them in Tauris the capitall citie of Persia, Greece is subiect to the yoke of their command, Constantinople sometimes called New Rome, by the transport of the Imperiall seat, is now made their throne, and so many prouinces and realmes which in former times depended vpon the Romane Empire, do now acknowledge their power; they are masters of the realmes of Egypt and Cyprus; the Islands of Rhodes, Meteline, Negrepont, Chio, and many others acknowledge them, the empire of Trebisond is theirs; the realme of Colchos, now called Mingrelia, payes them tribute: they of Tunis and Algier in Affrica obey them; Dalmatia, the Illayrians, Triballiens, the countries of Transiluania, Valachia, and Moldauia do them homage, and we see them commaund euen in the chiefe townes of the realmes of Hungaie: But all this power of the Ottomans had neuer beene so great nor so fearefull, but by the discord, diuision, and bad intelligence betwixt Christian princes, as you may read in the course of this historie, as well in Greece, at Constantinople as in other parts of Europe, whereas these princes contending one with anorher, haue furnished matter and meanes to the Turke to dispossesse them of the chiefe pieces of their monarchies. They measure the continuance of their Empire

A pire by the discord betwixt the Princes of the beleefe of the name of Iesus, and they confesse truely, that this diuision is the onely cause of their greatnesse, the which hath made them beleeue, that among Christians, there was a bad Angell enemie to peace, which they call the strong or powerfull Spirit, which kindling the fire of reuenge and ambition in the hearts of great men, drawes from their affections the good of their beleefe, to entertaine them in perpetuall discord; during the which, they promise vnto themselues a firme and an assured reigne. So the Mufti, and the Talismans praying on Friday in their Mosques, demand of their Prophet the circumstance of this bad intelligence betwixt Christian Princes, to the end they may inioy the empire which they haue vnjustly vsurped. Yet their prophecies do not promise
B them a perpetuall possession; behold one in their own tongue, which hath alwaies made them feare the vnion of Christians.

Patissahomomos ghelur caiferun menleker alur keuzul almai alur kapze iler ie di yladegh Giaur Keleci cſikmasse on ikigladegh on laron Begbhgheder. Enſi iapar, baghi diker batheſai baglar, ogli keſi olar; onichi ylddenſora Hriſtianon-keleci cſcchar, al Turkci ghereſ-ſine Tuſchure. A Turkish Prophesie.

C That is to say;

Our Emperour shall come, he shall possesse the realme of an Infidell prince, he shall take the red apple, and make it subiect to his power: if at the seuenth yere of his command the Christians sword doth not aduance, he shall rule vnto the twelfth yeare, he shall build houses, plant vines, compasse in gardens with hedges, and beget children: but after the twelfth yeare that he hath held the red apple, the Christians sword shall appeare and put the Turke to flight.

The exposition of their prophesie.

By the Infidell prince they vnderstand a Christian Prince (for so they call them) and by the Red Apple an Imperiall towne strong and important; in the which, and elsse where the Turkes
D shall build houses; that is to say, conuert holy temples to the vse of the Mahometan impiety: for by this word to build, they that haue commented vpon this prophesie, vnderstand vsurpation of the houses of God: Plant vines, by these words they signifie the extent of the Turkish Empire, and the setling of their colonies, as we see in Hungarie and Transyluania: Compassing in Gardens, that is to say, they shall fortifie the townes which they haue taken from their enemies: Beget Children, extend the Mahometan religion, far in the Christians countries. But after the twelfth yeare, &c. within a certaine time best knowne to God, his diuine Maiestie, opening the eyes of his clemencie vpon the Christians, will vnite the wills of their princes, kindle their affections with a holy zeale, and blessing their armes, wil make them victorious ouer
E the Turke, whom he wil banish out of the East, and chase into Scythia, from whence they came to be a scourge vnto Christendome. These are my wishes, wherein I hope all good Christians do concurre.

The beginning of the Turkish Empire.

Hauing runne ouer the occurrents which haue happened in the Turkes estate for the space of eleuen yeares, I must according to master Knolles his method, conclude the worke with a description of the Graund Seigniours port or Court, of his Gouernement, Officers, Riches, Force, and Religion. The Turkes (a people of Scythia) hauing like a violent deluge ouerthrowne a great part of the East, and taken diuers prouinces, beeing expelled from Hierusalem by Godfrey of Bouillon, and the Christians, their remainder retired to Nicea where they liued without any head or soueraigne commander, vntill that Ottoman about F the yeare of our Redeemer 1300, by practise, made himselfe sole and absolute monarch. His sonne conquering diuers prouinces, remoued his imperiall seat to Prusia, now called Bursia, the chiefe abode of the Kings of Bythinia. Amurath the first (beeing drawne in by the Emperour of Constantinople to succour him, and allured with the wealth of Europe) turned his armes against him, taking diuers prouinces and townes from him, amongst others Adrianopolis, which hee made the seat and residence of the Turkish Emperours, in the yeare 1363. But Mahomet the second hauing taken the citie of Constantinople, and expelled G head of the number.

The chiefe officers of the house. He hath day'ly a great number of persons resident in his pallace, imployed in their seuerall charges, some in one place, some in another, vnder their seuerall commanders. But among all the great men in his court these are of chiefest eminencie and note.

First the Capigi, that is to say, the mouth of the graund Seignour, by whom the Sultan speaketh to such as haue any great suit vnto him: for no Embassadour is admitted vnto him, but at his first arriuall when he deliuers his letters of credit and his presents, and when he hath any businesse to treat of he resorts to the Visier Bassa or his Aga.

The second is Casnadar Bassa, the chiefe Treasurour of the household, or superintendent of the Treasurie.

The third Sultani Bassa, chiefe cupbearer. M

The fourth is Seraglio Agasi, steward or master of the household.

The fifth is Chuller Agasi, or Saraidar Bassa, Ouerseer of his Seraglio of concubines, who is alwaies a cunuch if he test be.

The

A The sixth and last is Bostangi Bassa, chiefe Gardiner, and ouerseer of all his gardens, Captaine of his Iamoglans, and stearer of his Barge whensoeuer he goeth by water. Hee hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many Gardiners vnder him, which are called Bostangi, who when they come out of the Seraglio, become Ianizaries, Solacchi, or Capigi, according to their qualities.

These sixe Officers of the Sultans house aboue mentioned haue no authoritie out of his pallace, yet the greatest Bassaes stand in awe of them, and feare them, for that they haue free accesse vnto the Sultan, and haue dayly opportunitie to incense him against them: for by their secret suggestion and false informations, many of the greatest Bassaes are manie times suddenly and vndeseruedly cut off in the height of all their pompe
B and glorie.

Hee hath many Mutes or dumbe men attending about him, whereof eight bee his daily companions and play-fellowes in the Seraglio, in whose companie hee takes great delight: besides many others to the number of fortie, which attend vpon him as pages. They are all borne deafe and dumbe, yet by long practise they grow so perfect, as they will vnderstand any thing that shall be acted vnto them by signes and gestures; and will themselues by the gesture of their eyes, bodies, hands, and feet, deliuer matters of great difficultie, to the great admiration of strangers. The Sultans dumbe men.

The Graund Seigniour hath within his pallace a Seraglio, of young men to the number of fiue hundred, from eight yeares of age to twentie: these are the well-fauouredst A Seraglio of young men.
C and best proportioned of all the tribute children which hee draweth from Græcia and Natolia, and they are chosen out of his Seraglioes at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places, and brought to this to bee bred vp, where they are instructed in diuerse Arts, according to their disposition, but especially to read and write, and in the doctrine of their Law, and to ride, there beeing a great number of horses kept within this Seraglio for their exercise, and for the Eunuches. They neuer goe out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinkes them to be of fit age to vndergoe some charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtari, and to some hee giues greater places, according to their valour, or the fauour they haue gotten with him.

Hee hath in like manner about fourescore Mutaferache, that is to say, Launce-bearers They that carry his Launce.
D to the Graund Seignour: which carrie his Launce whensoeuer hee goeth to field, and acknowledge no other commander, and in time by his fauour or their merites, are made Captaines.

Hee hath alwaies aboue one thousand Eunuches entertained in seuerall places, where- The Sultans Eunuches.
of some of them are in verie great credit with him, and can preuaile much: they are called Hudurni, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgines in his Seraglio. They are not onely depriued of their genitors, but in their youth they haue their whole priuities smoothed off by their bellies, and in their Turbants they beare short E quills of siluer, through which they make water. This inhumane custome was first inuented by Sultan Solyman, who seeing a Gelding make offer to couer a Mare, grewe suspitious that they were able to doe some small thing, notwithstanding the losse of their genitors.

The Graund Seignour hath a Seraglio for his women without his pallace, in the The Sultans Seraglio of women.
which there are alwayes foure or fiue hundred young Virgines, the fairest of the Christians children, which hee gathereth vp out of Græcia for tribute. The Sultan repaires sometime thither to make choice of such as he shall like best for his pleasure; whereof they are aduertised the day before by the Eunuches, that they may prepare themselues in their best habits to giue him content. Being al in a roome, and standing vpon either side, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and viewes them, to her that hee likes, he casts a hand-
F kercher, (whereof hee hath many hanging at his girdle) and in this manner it may bee hee makes choice of halfe a dozen, the which his Eunuches obseruing, they put them prefently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his pallace. In this Seraglio they haue good entertainement, and are apparelled in silke twice a yeare, and are taught to make diuers workes by antient matrons, and are attended on by the younger sort.

Description of Constantinople.

But [illegible] Constantinople [illegible] three hundred Capigi's C ages and sexes to bee sold: and there they buy the faireſt they can get, but they will Turkes Seraglio.

The state of the Grand Seignior. As for the other Seraglio within the Sultans pallace, there remaines the Sultans wife their children, and ſuch other Concubines as hee hath made choice of for his [illegible]. He neuer marries, but when any one is brought vnto him, hee giues her an attire [illegible] of H gold, and tenne thouſand aſpers, cauſing her to liue in a chamber apart, encre[illegible] her dayly maintenance. The firſt that beares him a childe, is called Sultana, and is miſtreſſe of all the reſt, and moſt fauoured by him, as the chiefeſt of all his women, the reſt as they are fauored by the Prince, are brought vnto him to haue his pleaſure, and then returned backe againe: if they chance to be with childe, they are put into the number of the Sultanaes, and are much reſpected by him. Such as the Prince hath had the vſe of, but no children by them, are giuen in marriage to his ſlaues, who are aduanced to dignities, and made Gouernours of countries.

His guard foot men or porters. Hee hath three hundred Sollacchi, which march continually about his perſon, and make as it were his guard, beeing vnder the commaund of the [illegible] of Ianizaries; they are richly I attired, hauing lawne garments hanging downe beneath their knees, and ouer it a quilted waſtcoat with halfe ſleeues of taffatie, damaske, or ſatten, and on their heads caps and feathers like vnto the Captaine of the Ianizaries, and they attend on him with bowes and ar-rowes. He hath alſo ſtill about him when he rides abroad fortie Peichi, that is to ſay, footmen or poſtes which runne wonderfull ſwiftly, and are ſtill at hand to attend his commandements, where hee ſhall pleaſe to employ them: they weare long coats of cloth of gold with a broad girdle of the ſame, and caps like vnto womens thimbles, with a horne of ſiluer and gilt ſtanding vp before. There are about foure thouſand Capigi's or Porters which continually attend his pallace and Seraglios, they are attired like vnto the Ianizaries, and haue ouer them thee Capigi Baſſaes. Theſe men are many times employed to execute the K Grand Seigniors commandements, when he will haue any great mans head, or his throat cut, as we haue ſeene of late yeares in Gambolat Baſſa, and in Naſſuf Baſſa, who was graund Viſier to Achmat.

The Turkes ſeruitude. The Grand Seigniors gouernment is [illegible] abſolute, as they all tearme themſelues his ſlaues, and no man how great ſoeuer can aſſure himſelfe of his eſtate, no not of his life, but by the great Turks ſpecial fauor. He commits the managing of his eſtate to ſuch as haue abjured the Chriſtian religion, & haue bin brought by way of tything in their infancies from Greece and Natolia, and afterwards for their merits are aduanced to great dignities, as Baſſaes, Beg-lerbegs, and ſuch other. The Prince hath a court or Councell which they call Diuano, and this is held within the Seraglio foure dayes in the weeke; that is to ſay, Saturday, Sunday, L Munday, and Tueſday, where they treat of matters of State, and afterwards of the affaires of priuate men. To this Councell are admitted the Graund Viſier, eight or nine Baſſaes who are are alſo called Viſiers, and are continually reſident at Conſtantinople, (for there are many more which are employed abroad in the conduct of armies or gouernment of Countries) the Beglerbegs and others. At the riſing of the court or councell, the Grand Viſier informes the Sultan of all the proceedings in particular; wherein he dares not diſſemble, for that the Prince hath a window joyning to the Diuano, where he may heare and ſee any thing and not be ſeene. He ſeldome impugnes what they haue reſolued, vnleſſe it be to moderate ſome rigorous ſentence, or to giue anſwer to ſome Embaſſadour, and what he himſelfe concludes is irreuokable.

The Turkish iuſtice. Their ſuits are verie ſhort, for they haue no aduocates to breed delaies, as they haue in M Chriſtendome; yet commonly hee that bribes moſt ſpeeds beſt; for the Turkes are the moſt couetous and corrupt nation in the World, neither will they doe any man a kindneſſe without a fee; and yet they are not ſure to enjoy any thing they get no longer than it ſhall pleaſe

the Prince. They puniſh crimes with great ſeueritie, and ſpeedily, the fact being proued, A which doth ſo terrifie them, as by the report of ſuch as haue conuerſed long there, you ſhall ſeldome ſee a murder or a theft committed by any Turke; and if any foule fact be committed, it is moſt commonly done by Græcians.

ces ſignet, and is as it were the Lieutenant Generall of the whole monarchie: he hath autho-ritie ouer the other Baſſaes, and they are bound to yeeld him an account of their imployments. Hee is ſtill about the prince his perſon, and is not ſent abroad for any imploiment, vnleſſe it bee for an important warre, as they haue done of late yeares againſt the Perſian.
When the Viſier is ſent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Baſſaes to be his Lieutenant and to execute his authoritie, and he is called Chimacham. Mechmet Baſſa is at this preſent

Next vnto the Baſſa (which is as much to ſay as great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and The Beglerbegs and Sanzacks.
haue their places in court next vnto them. They are men of great authoritie, and haue the command of great kingdoms and armies, vnder whoſe obedience are diuers Sanzacks which are ſent as Gouernors into prouinces during the princes pleaſure. Theſe are men of great experience, and haue command ouer the Spahi, and Timariots, the Turks chiefe forces on horſbacke, whom they cal continually to exerciſe their armes. There is one Beglerbeg of Greece, which hath all the countries in Europe in the Turks dominions vnder his charge, and this is the firſt of all the Beglerbegs, who hath vnder him aboue thirtie Sanzackes. There are ſix other Beglerbegs in Aſia, whereof the firſt is he of Natolia or Aſia the leſſe. He hath the go-C uernment of Pontus, Bythinia, and other Kingdomes, and hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes.
The Beglerbeg of Caramania with ſeuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Aladuley, vnder whoſe command are ſeuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Amazia and Toccato, hauing foure Sanzackes. There is alſo one in Meſopotamia, and vnder his command twelue Sanzackes or Gouernours of prouinces. There is likewiſe a Beglerbeg of Damas, Suria, and Iudæa, who hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes. And there is one of Caire, who commands ouer ſixteene Sanzacks, his charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not ſo obedient as the Turks other countries.

The great Turkes forces. As for the Turkes forces, they conſiſt of horſemen, footmen, and fleets at ſea. His horſemen conſiſt of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglani, Silictari & Olofagi, who haue aſſignations of lands D for the entertainment of them and their horſes. For no man can enjoy any poſſeſſions, but he is enjoyned to entertaine a certaine number of ſouldiers proportionable to the reuenues of the land: ſo as the Gouernour or Baſſa is alwaies bound to haue this number ready to march when they are called. Of theſe Timariots they are able to raiſe about an hundred and fiftie The Timariots. thouſand horſe alwaies readie at the firſt call, for the which the prince diſburſeth not a penny; for in regard of the land which is allotted them, they are bound to maintaine themſelues, their horſe and armes in the war. Whereſoeuer the Turke conquereth any countrey, he diuides it among his ſouldiers; aſſigning 4000 aſpers yerely (which is little aboue ten pound ſterling) to euerie one for himſelfe and his horſe, and ſo proportionably if he haue more land. Theſe horſemen are much peſtered with armes when they goe to warre: for they haue a jacke, a E ſpeare with a little white banner, a caliuer hanging vnder his left arme, a cemitar, a bow and arrows at his girdle, and a battleaxe at his ſaddle bow. And of theſe kind of horſemen they ſay there are 80000 in Greece, beſides an infinit number in his other countries. This Turkiſh Cauallerie worke two great effects, for they ſerue as a ſupport to his eſtate, to ſuppreſſe all ſeditions, and they are readie to vndertake any enterpriſe. Beſides theſe he enteraines many horſmen about his perſon, whereof ſome are Spahi, and theſe are Chriſtian ſlaues bred vp The Spahis. yong in the princes ſeraglio, who by their merits attain to that degree, and afterwards to greater dignities. They are alwaies attending about the princes perſon whereſoeuer he goes, bee-ing commonly thirteene hundred.

The Caripices & Spachoglani. The Caripices are held for the flower of all his horſemen, beeing in number about eight F hundred, who march ſtill about the princes perſon during the wars. The Spachoglani which is as much to ſay as yong men on horſebacke, are aboue three thouſand, who haue yearely penſions in money, which they are bound to receiue yearely at Conſtantinople, or elſe they are held as dead men. In the wars they march on the right hand of the Grand Seigniour, and are knowne

A twentie foure thousand of these Ianizaries when as the Graund Seigniour is there, (for in his whole estate he hath a far greater number) vnder their Aga or Captaine Generall, which is a place of great credit, but not like vnto any of their Bassaes; the great Turke fearing to joyne power and authoritie together. Being once Ianizaries, they are either sent to the wars, or put in garrison, or else they remaine at the Sultans court (which they call port) where they haue certaine spacious places for their dwelling, like to religious houses, where they liue vnder their commanders: and the younger serue the antient with great respect. All the Ianizaries of one squadron eat together at one table, and sleep in certaine long halls, and if any one chance to be absent all night, he shall (the next night) be beaten with a cudgell, which he takes so patiently as he kisseth his hand that hath thus corrected him. They are much respected and feared of B all men, and are diuersly imploied in the citie; as to see the peace and good orders kept, to looke to the prices of things, to arrest malefactors, and to guard the gates. If they buy any thing they will haue it at their owne rate; they cannot be iudged but by their Aga or Captaine. There is seldome any one punished with death by the course of iustice, without danger of a mutinie; and therefore they execute them very secretly. They haue many meanes to get money; for some attend vpon Embassadors and keep their houses; others go with trauellers, to guard them safely through the Turks Estate. They haue a great power in their princes election; so as to winne their loues euerie new Emperor at his first comming to the Crowne giues them a donatiue, and increaseth their pay, presuming vpon their valour and multitude. They many times commit strange insolencies vpon any discontents; as in firing of houses, braving the Bassaes, and sometimes bearding the Sultan himselfe, as you may read in this
C Historie.

The chiefe strength of the Turkes forces consists in the Ianizaries; and yet there are other sorts of footmen, whereof some are called Aconizes, which is a forlorne hope, and receiue no pay, but march before the armie, and haue leaue to spoile; so as they giue the fifth part of their bootie to the prince. There is another kinde called Azapi: these are souldiers of small effect, and serue rather with the pickaxe and spade than with the sword: they are fitter to tire an enemie with their numbers, than to vanquish them with their valour; and they are accustomed to fill vp ditches with their dead bodies to make a passage for the Ianizaraies to ascend vnto a breach. The grand Seignior hath euer 6000 Gunners in pay whom they call Topegi. And for the guard of the powder and shot when the armie marcheth, there are alwaies 12000 men in pay, whom they call Iebegi.

Aconizes. Azapi. Topegi and Iebegi.

D The grand seignior hath also certaine officers attending on him to the number of 3000, whom they call Chiaus, which are as it were sergeants at arms. These are men well esteemed, and are often imployed in embassies to forreine princes: They also carrie letters and commendations from the prince or his chiefe Visier, and they apprehend offendors. These neuer go to the war but when as the Sultan is there in person. They are commanded by a Chiaus Bassa, who is of so great credit with all men (as Sansouino writes) that when he is sent by the grand seignior to any Bassa, Sanzacke, or Cadi, with order to haue any mans head cut off, he is obeyed, although he haue no warrant in writing, as if the prince were there himselfe, and commanded it.

The Chiaus.

E Thus we haue set downe the grand seigniors forces at land, whose numbers are so great, as in shew they should breed confusion and ruine themselues; but they keepe verie good order and discipline, so as in that point they yeeld not to any. They liue of a little bread baked in the ashes, with rice and the powder of flesh dried in the sunne: They may drinke no wine, and there are no women seene in their armies: they obserue a wonderfull silence, and all the souldiers are gouerned by the becke of the hand, or any shew of the countenance. Quarrels and thefts are seuerely punished. When they march they dare not enter into any corne fields nor vines. The valiant are assured of preferments, and cowards of punishment.

The Turks discipline in their armies.

Hauing spoken sufficiently of their land forces, let vs see what strength he hath at sea: they haue great store of forests for the building of ships; neither want they good shipwrites, for F that couetousnesse hath drawne many Christian carpenters into the grand seigniors arsenal: And he hath great numbers of men trained vp in marine affaires, in regard of the gallies which he hath at Mitilene, Rhodes, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and for the retreat hee giues pyrats at Tunis, Bona, Bugia and Algiers, from whence hee drawes commaunders

and

A prouinces. The one hath his charge ouer Europe, and is called Cadileſquirie Romly, before whom (after good information of his life, and ſufficiencie) he ſweares that he will doe iuſtice to all men, and yeeld an account of his charge when he ſhall be called. The other Cadileſquirie is for Natolia: they are ſoueraigne iudges in all cauſes, and as it were Patriarks. They are of great authoritie, and haue place in the Diuano with the Baſſa's to conſult of weighty matters.

There is a third degree of their churchmen, belonging to their law, called Mulli, which are biſhops and chiefe gouernors vnder the Mufti; and their office is to place and diſplace churchmen at their diſcretion. Next are the Nuderiſi, who are ſuffragans to the Biſhops, and their charge is to ſee the Cadies do their duties. Next come the Cadi's who are Iudges to puniſh offendors, of which there is one in euerie citie vnder the Seigniors command. The Mulli, Muderiſi, and Cadi

B Vnder theſe are another kind of yong Doctors of the law called Naipi, who are not ſo wel read as to be abſolute Iudges, but yet ſupply their places in their abſence. The Naipi.

After theſe are the Hogi, who write their bookes, for that they allow no printing: and inferior vnto them are the Calfi, who read vnto them that write. And the yongeſt of all are called Softi, who are yong ſtudents or nouices in their law. The Hogi, Calfi, and Softi.

Theſe are their ſeuerall degrees of lawyers or churchmen: for the Turks are gouerned by a kinde of Eccleſiaſticall law, according to their Alcaron. They haue colledges (called Medreſſæ) at Conſtantinople, and in other places, where they liue and ſtudie their law and diuinitie, and ſo they aſcend by degrees to the higheſt dignitie of their profeſſion.

As for their religion, it began in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, when as the empire was much diſmembred by the hereſies of Arrius and Neſtorius. Mahomet borne in Arabia im- The Turkiſh religion.

C braced this opportunitie, ſeeking to ouerthrow the diuinitie of Ieſus Chriſt, which was oppoſed by the Iewes and Arabians: he was aſſiſted by two hereticks, the one was Iohn a Neſtorian, and the other Sergius an Arrian. After which (being aſſiſted by many ſlaues, to whom hee allowed all that was pleaſing to the ſence and fleſh if they ſhould receiue this law) he obtained many victories. By Mahomets law they make a diſtinction of clean & vnclean meats to content the Iews, and alſo it maintains circumciſion, but not at the eight day of their birth, as the Iews vſe it, but after the eight yeare, when the infant is able to make confeſſion of his faith, where lifting vp his finger he ſpeakes theſe words, which are grauen in their temples in the Arabian tongue: There is but one God, whoſe Prophet Mahomet is, one God and equall Prophets. The circumciſion being ended, they feaſt three daies together, and then they carry the circumciſed

D to a bath with great pompe; after which the gueſts conduct him to his houſe, and preſent him with gifts. The women are not circumciſed, but onely ſpeake the words. If any Chriſtian abiure his faith and indure circumciſion (as they often do by reaſon of their tributes and vexations) they are led through the towne with great honor and reioicing of the people, who doalſo giue vnto them, and they pay no tributes. Mahomets law denies the diuinitie of Ieſus Chriſt, to pleaſe the Arrians who were then powerfull: It is full of fables to pleaſe Idolaters, and it giues libertie to the fleſh, which is pleaſing to moſt men.

They confeſſe one God, and honor Ieſus Chriſt, not as the ſonne of God, but as a prophet borne of the Virgin Marie. They neither honor nor allow images. Friday is their Sabbath as Sunday is ours. They obſerue a Lent of 30 daies, which they cal Ramadan; during which they

E eat nothing in the day time, but when night comes all meats are indifferent, but ſwines fleſh; yet they abſtaine from wine and women. They haue their Eaſter called Bayran, which continues three daies, in which they enioy all pleaſures: but this feaſt is not alwaies prefixed, for that they account not the day according to the courſe of the Sun, but of the Moone; and therefore they do carefully obſerue the new Moone, and ſalute it.

They haue no bels in their Moſques, neither do they ſuffer the Chriſtians which liue there to haue any. They put off their ſhooes when they go into their Moſques, and take them again at their comming forth. Whereſoeuer they ſit in their churches or houſes, they haue tapeſtrie couerlets or mats vnder them: they are not much giuen to contemplation or learning, yet the Turkiſh women being married and hauing iſſue, are carefull to breed vp their children, and to

F be inſtructed; for the which there are many ſchooles, where they read their lawes, to the end they may ſerue in their Moſques, and be able to gouerne the common weale.

The Turkes by Mahomets law haue leaue to marrie as many wiues as they can maintaine; and a Turkiſh woman being once with childe, her husband neuer toucheth her vntill ſhee be deliuedeliuered, but lies with his slaues out of the house where his wife remaines. They haue a cer- G taine kind of marriage made at pleasure, which they call Kebin, the which is many times practised by strangers, who being out of their country contract with women, whom they are to enjoy during their pleasure, and when they cast them off, they giue them a certaine summe of money, and keepe the children. The Cadis or Iudges allow not this kinde of contract, especially amongst Christians, vnlesse it be with an oath of marriage. A Turke hauing had the vse of a Christian woman, they are both condemned to die, vnlesse she will abiure her faith:

the like is obserued betwixt a Christian and a Turkish woman, if they haue been found together. Diuorce is allowed among them in case of barrennesse and incontinencie.

There are foure orders of religious men among the Turks which differ in liuing, habit, and ceremonies. These be the Terlaques, Derus, Kalenders, and Huquiemes, and these H last are very vicious, and wicked impostors, deceiuing of the common people. The Deruis is a strict order liuing in contemplation, much like vnto the Capuchins among the Romish Papists. The Turkes forbeare to blaspheme either God, Christ, or Mahomet, or any other Saint whatsoeuer, and they punish blasphemie seuerely. They conuerse with Christians, and eat and traffique with them freely; yea sometimes they marrie their daughters, and suffer them to liue after their owne religion. But they hate the Iewes, and despise them as the basest people in the world. They haue an assured confidence, that he that shall duely obserue the laws of Mahomet, shall haue eternall life, and a Paradise full of delights: and contrariwise they that shall breake the lawes of their Alcaron are threatned with pain and eternall death; yet they haue an opinion that hee that beleeues in the Alcaron when hee dies, shall bee vndoubtedly I saued.

The disposition of the Turkes.

To conclude this relation with some few lines of their humours and dispositions; they write of them that they are grosse witted, idle, and vnfit for labour. They are exceeding couetous and corrupt, aboue all other Nations; for iustice is sold to him that offers most. They are humble among themselues, and obey their superiors with great silence. They are proud and insupportable to strangers, thinking none fit to be compared with them. They are giuen to gluttonie and drunkennesse, and will spend whole daies together in feasting, and will drinke with excesse if it be in priuate, for that it is forbidden by their law. They are vaineglorious, proud, and deceitfull, neuer keeping their words, but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to venerie, and are for the most part all Sodomites. They are very superstitious, giuing credit to dreams and diuinations; and they hold that euery mans destinie is written in his forehead, which cannot be altered or auoided. K

Thus I haue continued this historie foreleuen yeares, hauing informed my selfe out of the best authours and intelligencers I could finde that concerne this subiect: I should haue beene glad that some which haue resided at Constantinople most part of this time, would haue assisted me with their obseruations which should haue been for the generall good of our nation; but I hope notwithstanding the reader shall finde content and satisfaction. A CONTINVATION OF THE TVRKISH HISTORIE, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD, 1620. VNTILL THE ENDING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1628.

COLLECTED OVT OF THE PAPERS and Dispatches of Sir THOMAS ROE, Knight, his MAIESTIES Embassadour with the Grand Seigniour during that time.

By M. B.

Efore wee come to speake of the great preparations made by the Grand Seigniour, in the yeare 1621, to inuade the Kingdome of Poland; and those by that King to resist him; I hold it somewhat necessarie, briefely to set downe the causes and reasons of the ensuing warre. 1620.

The cause of the warre betweene the king of Poland and the grand seignior.

The Chrim Tartar, confining vpon the dukedome of Russia and borders of Poland, made many incursions, and did great spoile vpon the Cossackes within the sayd prouince of Russia, and other parts belonging to the Kingdome of Poland, and carrying away people of all ages and sexes, made sale of them within the Turkish Empire. Now Iean-begh-Ghiray-Han Prince of the Tartars, being wholly dependant on the Ottoman Emperours, his Majestie of Poland sent many seuerall Embassadors to complaine at that Port; That notwithstanding the antient league betweene him and the Ottoman Family, the Tartars greatly spoiled his Countries; which was both vniust and vnreasonable. How soeuer the complaints were many and great, yet the King of Polands Ministers found no redresse for those their alledged wrongs; but were answered, That the Tartars were absolute Lords ouer themselues, and that they pretended to haue an annuall tribute of fourtie thousand florins from the King of Poland; which beeing denied them, they had reason so to doe: and that the Grand Seigniour could onely entreat, but not command them to surceasse. The Tartars seeing the Polacke thus sleighted at the Port, grew more insolent and outragious euery day: wherewith the Turkes were well content, for the great great benefit they receiued by theſes which were continually brought to be ſold in their dominions, (as was ſayd before) finding for the moſt part, that thoſe men had able bodies, and fit to be applied to the oare. It is true, that the Chrim Tartars in ancient time, being ſo neere neighbours, were wont to receiue ſuch a ſtipend from the Crowne of Poland, for which they were obliged to ſerue in euery occaſion of warre. But of later times the payment ed, becauſe they rather receiued hurt, than any aſſiſtance of that vagebond and proud people.

When the Coſſacks ſaw that after ſo many complaints they could not hope to procure reſtitution of their wrongs, nor take their reuenge vpon the Tartars (being a ſtrong and warlike people, and had no certaine place of abode) they reſolued to fall vpon the poſſeſions of the Grand Seignior, who ſeemed, in not to protect, yet to commit at leaſt the iniuries receiued from theſe their neighbours. The Coſſacks then that inhabited vpon the bankes of the riuer Boriſthenes (which emptieth it ſelfe into the blacke ſea) were conſented vnto by the for the execution of this reuenge: and therefore they prepared a great number of well armed Barques, and falling downe the ſaid riuer, did very great damage to the Turke, by robbing, burning, and ſpoyling diuers Townes and Villages bordering vpon the Blacke ſea. The newes being brought to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seignior tooke it in great ſcorne, that ſuch a baſe and rude people ſhould come and affront him ſo neere his dores. Therefore he cauſed ſome gallies to be armed forth with ſpeed to ſuppreſſe them: but his forces were foure or fiue times valiantly repulſed, and ſtill the Coſſacke went ſafely home with his prey. Now the tyde of affaires was turned, and this great Emperour, who was formerly petitioned by the Polacke, is now become a ſuitor to him himſelfe, and ſindes Miniſters meaſured by the anſwer the Grand Seignior had giuen concerning the wrongs done by the Tartars: That though the Coſſackes adhere to the Crowne of Poland, yet are they a free people of themſelues; but when the Tartar ſhall ceaſe from his hoſtilitie, it is like enough the Pole will entreat the Coſſacke to do the ſame; and that is all the authoritie he can exerciſe ouer them.

The perſuaſions of the Grand Seignior for the warre with the King of Poland.

Affaires ſtanding thus, no accommodation for wrongs on either ſide could be made; and the Grand Seignior, although he was but now fifteene yeares of age, yet was he ſtrong, vigorous, and of a high ſpirit, and more than deſirous of a war, but eſpecially with the King of Poland, from whom he looked for better ſatisfaction. This deſire was nouriſhed in him by the counſels of Ali Baſſa, grand Vizier; notwithſtanding it was vtterly diſliked by all the reſt of the Miniſters of State, and Officers of warre in that Empire. A war was neuertheleſſe there-vpon proclaimed throughout all the Turks Dominions, which did in generall diſpleaſe the common ſouldier alſo.

1621. The Grand Seignior the foure and twentieth of Aprill commanded payment to be made to all the Souldierie, and the day following cauſed all his Tents and Pauilions, with thoſe of his Viziers and other Officers, to be ſolemnely pitched without the citie, with thoſe of all trades that were to attend his Royall campe.

The Grand Seignior hauing now gathered of foot and horſe three hundred thouſand (though reported to be ſix hundred thouſand) ſet forward together with his Court and traine out of Conſtantinople the nine and twentieth of Aprill, with three hundred field pieces, be-ſide a hundred double cannon ſent vnto the frontiers by ſea; leauing Achmat Baſſa and the Boſtangi Baſſa Gouernours of the citie till his returne.

The beginning of the warre with the king of Poland.

When he was arriued at the confines of Poland, he firſt attempted the fortreſſe of Cotyn in the prouince of Moldauia, lately giuen by Gaſparo Gratiani to the Polacks. The which being ſtrong of ſcituation, and well furniſhed for defence, the Turke finding it difficult to carrie in few dayes, left it aſſieged; and paſſing the riuer of Boriſthine, found there the Chancellour of Poland intrencht vpon the borders, in a ſtrong place, and of good aduantage, kept with fourtie thouſand Polacks and Coſſacks, and eight thouſand high Dutch ſent by the Emperor in aid of the King of Poland. The Prince was incamped at Caminitza, and ſtrongly intrenched with ſixtie thouſand ſouldiers; the King abiding in Cracouia with the Nobility and his Court. The Grand Seignior facing the trenches vpon Boriſthine, with the multitude of his armie incloſed them round, and ſhut vp all the paſſages; ſending preſently the prince of the Tartars, Iean-beagh-Ghiray-Han with thirtie thouſand light horſe to make incurſions within the heart of Poland: who did great ſpoyle, and brought away captiues twentie fiue thouſand ſoules

A ſoules of all ſorts; which dammage did not ſo much proceed from the will of the Prince, as from a Captaine of his, a nobleman of Tartarie called Kante-Emir-Emirze, in great fauour at that time with the Emperour: for it was thought that betweene the King of Poland, and the Prince of Tartarie, there was ſome ſecret intelligence by the vertue of money.

During the ſpace of foure and thirtie daies that the Grand Seignior held theſe Trenches be-ſieged, almoſt euerie other day hee gaue them terrible aſſaults, but was alway forced to retire with loſſe. The Polacke in brauerie making ſome ſallies and encounters, were alſo glad to recouer their ſtrength; onely once they ſo farre aduanced in the euening with their ſhot vp-on the quarter of the Ianizaries, that they made a great execution, and almoſt put the whole Campe into diſorder; and as the Turkes themſelues did confeſſe, if this ſallie had beene gi-B uen in the night, it had hazarded the confuſion of the whole armie: All which being ſeene by the Graund Seignior, and little hope of aduancing further, for diuers reaſons hee was enforced to treat a ceſſation of Armes with the Chancellour. The firſt was, That conſide-ring hee had ſpent ſo much time without any aduantage, and the Winter approching, whereby his armie ſuffered great extremities of cold and other miſeries, by reaſon of terrible raines which had carried away diuers tents, horſes, and other cattell, and ſome part of his cannons. Secondly, the prouiſion of fodder was become ſo deare, that diuers forſooke their hor-ſes for want of meanes to feed them: beſides the great mortalitie of men, of fluxes, Feauers, and colds, and the horſes of Aſia not vſed to ſuch a climate, that many men of qualitie that came out with ten and twelue, were compelled to returne on foot. Thirdly, the armie either C for wearineſſe, or for diſcontent receiued from the Emperour himſelfe, for his narrowneſſe and auarice ſhewed to the ſouldier, contrarie to the glorious example of his anceſtors in like enterpriſes, not onely refuſed to fight, but were little leſſe than mutined. Fourthly, this attempt from the beginning, proceeding meerely from the obſtinacie of the Grand Seignior, contrarie to the counſell of all his Viſiers, who deſired generally a peace: at their ſolicitation and by the mediation of Radula Prince of Valachia, both parts were eaſily induced to treatie, and the Chancellour was drawne to ſend a Secretarie to the Grand Seignior; where it was agreed, as followeth.

Firſt, That the Emperour ſhould raiſe his armie, and retire from the confines of Poland; and the Tartars as the occaſioners of this warre ſhould ſend an Emirze to reſide as a pledge from enſuing in-D curſions. The Chancellour promiſing in the name of the King of Poland, to keepe another in the Court of the Prince of Tartarie, with condition to pay yearely as aforeſaid fortie thouſand florins (an antient pretenſion of the Tartars) as a donatiue from the King of Poland; promiſing moreouer, for the better confirmation of the future peace, to maintain a Reſident in the Port of the Ottoman Court; and vpon the arriuall of euerie ſuch Embaſſadour to ſend a preſent conformable to the Ledgiers of other Chriſtian Princes. And as the Grand Seignior was obliged for the Tartars that they ſhould forbeare all inuaſions vpon the Polacke; ſo the Polacks ſhould binde themſelues in behalfe of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould commit no robberies in the dominion of the Grand Seignior. And further couenanting in the name of the Poliſh merchants for the priuiledge of free traffique, to make a preſent of an hundred thouſand chequins in plate, ſables, and Bulgarie hides; alway intended with this refer-E uation, that this treatie ſhould not preiudice or binde, vntill the Graund Seignior did ſend a Chiaus to the King of Poland with theſe ouertures, that he might haue time to aſſemble his Parliament, and there reſolue to ſend an Embaſſadour with ample authoritie to treat and conclude a finall peace in the Port. Whereupon the Grand Seignior being ſatisfied with theſe conditions, did diſpatch pre-ſently his Nuntio into Poland, and ſuddenly to the great content of all his armie, he raiſed his campe and returned to Adrianople.

The loſſes in the Turkiſh and Poliſh armies.

By relation of diuers preſent in that warre, it was reported, That there died in the Turkes campe, by the ſword, famine, ſickneſſe, and cold, about eightie thouſand men, and aboue an hundred thouſand horſe; and the remaine at their returne appearing ſo naked, ſickly, and poore, made euident demonſtration of the great loſſe and miſerie ſuſtained. The Polacks in F their trenches loſt aboue twentie thouſand by the famine ſuffered in their beſieging: ſo that if the Winter, and other wants had not conſtrained the Grand Seignior to riſe with ſome pretence of honor, and that he had ſtaied a few daies longer, they had been enforced to render or periſh; which is euident, in that they were glad and prompt to accept of any agreement, although as yet there was nothing fully concluded.

1621. The Grand Seignior enraged that the Emperour had sent aids to the Pole.

The Grand Seignior being informed that the Emperour of Germany had sent aid of eight thousand Dutch to the King of Poland, and enraged that he had so little aduanced in that attempt; pretending that the Emperour by giuing succours had broken the peace; to vent his choler, contrarie to the aduice of his Councell, presently vpon his arising from the confines of Poland, in his campe proclaimed warre against Germanie for the next Spring; commanding vpon great penaltie, all his souldiers and slaues to be readie for that inuasion. Which gaue great discontent to the Armie, insomuch as they did almost publiquely professe, they neither could nor would follow him. And conformable to this his rash resolution, hee gaue order to Kante-Emir-EmirZe, a Tartarian Captaine then Bassa of Silistra, to winter with twentie thousand of his souldiers in the countrey. Presently hereupon, Cæsar Gallo the Emperours Embassadour was stayed at Buda; the Grand Seigniour pretending, that he said Cæsar Gallo had promised vpon his life, That the Emperor would giue no aid to the King of Poland. Not considering that hee himselfe, contrary to the peace, the Sommer before had surprised Vatz a towne of Hungarie, and had permitted many of his souldiers to follow the Prince of Transyluania, as voluntiers against the Emperour.

The Graund Seignior changeth his minde of making war against the emperour.

The King of Poland hearing of this resolution against the Emperour, called the Chiaus sent about the Treatie, before him, and told him, That if the Grand Seigniour shold proceed to make war vpon the Emperour for his occasion, that he could conclude no peace with him, being obliged to take part with the Emperour as his deere brother and confederate. Which message the Chiaus sent to the Grand Seigniour, when he was yet at Adrianople, where hee either purposed to Winter to affright the Emperour, or to [illegible]cken the Polacke to a conclusion of peace: cold in his sudden pretence, by the persuasions of the Visiers and Mufti, hee changed his resolution, and tooke his way to Constantinople, where hee entred the last of December.

Now it being giuen out, that the Emir of Sidon in Siria was in rebellion, and that he had possessed himselfe of the citie and castle of Tripolie, the Grand Seignior pretended to go in person against him, and gaue out 60000 Checquines to prepare his carriages and pauilions; and tooke order to prouide his pallace in Aleppo, determining to passe that way to amuse and raise suspition in the Persian: and likewise commanded the armie of Asia to be in readines by the end of the month of April; & gaue out commission for victuals, munition, & other necessaries. The Mufti, Hoja, & other the Viziers (who knew not the mistery) misliking this counsell, with great instances & reasons dissuaded him, as being a course verie dangerous to his estate. First, that his Maiestie should go in person, leauing all Greece desolate, and commit the care & gouernment of his Imperial seat to a poore Chimacham or lieutenant; it not being probable that the Emir of Sidon would stay to oppose himselfe against the force of his royal armie, but rather make an escape, and retyre himself to some part of Christendom: & that a Generall by land, and the Captaine Bassa Admirall of the sea, with his Fleet of Gallies, would suffice to puunish and destroy him. Besides, if his Maiestie vndertooke the journey in person, it was necessarie that all his souldiers should attend him, which were a charge superfluous and aboue the enterprise, and almost impossible for them, hauing been so harrassed and distressed in the late inuasion of Poland (who did euen publiquely murmure that they would not go.) For which reasons the King changed his resolution, and was content to make a Generall by land with the Armie of Asia; to which charge was named the Bassa of Cairo. The next day after the Grand Seigniours comming to the Arsenall, he called the Vizier Bassa, the Admirall, and the great Treasurer before him; where it was concluded to make readie at least a hundred Gallies: for the preparation whereof sixtie thousand Checquines were then deliuered; the Vizier promising to furnish the rest of the whole charge with expedition, of his owne purse, and to take it vp vpon the Kings assignations. Whereupon the Grand Seigniour with great content did vest them as a marke of fauour, and gaue present commission to the Admirall to be readie and to depart by the middest of Aprill following; and for his better strength he gaue a command to send for aids to Tunis and Algier: which was thought requisite, because it was reported, that the Prince Philibert of Sauoy, then Viceroy of Sicilie, had in readinesse sixtie Gallies and six Gallions at Messina, which force was doubted would be employed to giue succour to the Emir of Sidon, or to reuenge the attempt and late sacke of Manfredonia; so that they were with all expedition rigging and preparing the Armado in the Arsenall;

A nall: and for prouision and preuention of the worst, there was ordained twelue small gallies and the ordinarie fleet of Frigots to keepe the blacke Sea from the incursion of the Cossacks. 1621
And though it was giuen out that this army was onely prepared against the Emir, yet many that vnderstood the secrets of that empire, knowing it to be too great, did beleeue it should be sent to preuent a generall reuolt which was then murmured and suspected in Asia.

The Grand Seignior marrieth.

About this time, contrarie to the Counsell and will of all his ministers, the Grand Seigniour married the Grand-childe of a Sultana, wife to Pertau Bassa onely for her beautie, without any pompe, which was ill interpreted in that Court; his ancestours of late yeares not vsually taking wiues, especially of a Turkish race, for respect of kindred. This and other inconstancies, with extreame auarice, made him odious with the souldier; and his daily haun-
B ting the streets on foot, sometimes disguised with a Page or two, prying into houses and Tauerns like a pettie officer, encreased his contempt euen in the Citie.

Secret order to make war vpon the emperor.

Secret order was giuen about the same time to Diac-Mahomet the Bassa of Canisia, and to Gelut-EmirZe a Tartarian, to vnite themselues with Bethlem Gabor against the Emperour of Germanie: But the Bassa of Buda did aduertise the Graund Seigniour, that Gabor had concluded peace with the Emperour; which newes did greatly displease him, being ardent in the desire of warre.

His Maiesty of great Britains embassador arriued at the Port.

The peace betweene the Graund Seigniour and the King of Poland, was not yet fully concluded; but Embassadours weekely expected at the Port from Poland and other places, to hasten a full consummation thereof. Amongst which, Sir Thomas Roe Knight Embassadour in C ordinarie from his Maiestie of Great Britaine to the Grand Seigniour, arriued there the first of Ianuarie, and had his first audience of him speedily, when he made this speech vnto him in English, which immediatly hereafter followeth.

Most high and mightie Emperour, his sacred Maiestie the King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, my most gracious Lord and Soueraigne, according to the antient league of friendship and amitie, of long time begun and continued betweene the most noble Ancestours of your Maiesties, and in his Royall person confirmed by his sundrie Embassadours and Letters, both to your renowned father, and your Imperiall Maiestie; being fully determined on his part, to maintaine, and inuiolably to hold, a faire and good peace and correspondencie with your Maiestie: hath commanded and sent mee with his Letters of credence and friendly Present, to reside as his Embassadour in your Royall Court. Not doubting but your Imperiall Maiestie will accept them, and receiue mee, his D seruant with your woonted honour and fauour; and that you will giue credit vnto mee in those matters of importance which he hath commanded me to deliuer in his name, comprehended in fiue articles written in this Memoriall: And that you will be pleased to do therein according to the [illegible] all friendship of his Maiestie and your princely wisedome and Iustice. The particulers whereof I desire your Maiestie to read and consider at your ease and leisure; and to affoord me your [illegible] answer, his Maiestie resting assured hee shall receiue content and satisfaction worthie the [illegible] friendship.

E The Letter of Credence sent by Sir Thomas Roe

IAmes by the Grace of God King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, Defender of the [illegible] stian Faith, against all those that falsly professe the name of Iesus, & [illegible] mightie Prince, Sultan Osman Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the [illegible] Empire of the East, sendeth health and greeting.

WE doubt not but you receiued our Letters sent vnto you by our [illegible] wee signified vnto you our royall pleasure in recall and [illegible] Ayre, from his employment and residencie in your Court, whom [illegible]
F fauour to dismisse for our especiall seruice, and to [illegible] remaine in your protection; for the better support and [illegible] and abide in your Dominions, and for the [illegible] and friendship, which hath beene a long time [illegible] the arriuall of our seruant Sir Thomas Roe, [illegible]

as our Embassadour; as well to propound vnto you diuers things necessarie for the generall peace, G as to reside in your Court for our particular seruice. Notwithstanding, lest the said letters should not come safely to your royall hands, wee haue thought fit againe to make knowne our purpose of recalling our former Embassador Sir Iohn Ayre, and to desire you to discharge and dismisse him from your Port, and to receiue and admit in his roome our trustie and welbeloued seruant Sir Thomas Roe one of the principall Gentlemen of our Court, and of our Priuie Chamber, whom wee haue now expressely sent, and whome wee authorise vnder our great Seale of England as our Embassadour to reside at your Port, and to negotiate in our name, and in the behalfe of our subiects abiding within your Kingdomes: of whose fidelitie and discretion as we are well assured, so wee doubt not but hee will giue you good content in his demeanor and negotiation with you. Wee haue also thought fit to put you in minde of those common rouers vpon the seas, who are enemies to the Law of Nations, and H spoylers of the quiet and peaceable Merchant, by whom amitie and friendship is many times betweene Kings and Princes: That you would please to exercise your great and mightie power to chastise and destroy them, as traitors to you honour, and infringers of the sacred and publique peace. In full assurance that you wil extend the same good respect vnto vs, as your Royall ancestors haue done vnto our most renowned predecessors, wherby that antient league and commerce may be inuiolably maintained betweene both our Kingdomes, which on our part wee shall be verie loath to infringe or dissolue. We doe by these our letters recommend vnto your princely fauour, this our said trustie seruant and Em-bassadour, to reside and remaine in your Port, on our behalfe to treat with you in all affaires for the publique weale of our dominions, and for the generall peace of us both, and our allies and friends, as also for the support and aid of all our subiects, which doe liue and trade within your estates and coun- I tries; to whose good discretion we recommend their affaires, and by whose industrie and mediation we conceiue our people may be relieued in their iust and reasonable demands, to the perfect maintenance and assurance of that mutuall commerce which hath so long time beene continued betweene our Royall progenitours. And as wee haue great cause to professe our gratefull acknowledgement, for many fauours which our former Embassadours and all other our subiects, haue, and doe receiue from your Royall hands, so in our princely loue, we doe intreat you to take knowledge of, and to command redresse for diuers oppressions and wrongs done vnto some of our said subiects persons and goods, that liue vnder the assurance of your friendship with vs, which wee haue formerly signified to our Residents at your Port: but as wee verily beleeue, they haue neuer come vnto your eares, that are K open to the iust complaints of all strangers; whereof we haue now giuen charge to our seruant and Embassadour to acquaint you with more at large, vnto whom wee desire you to giue protection and credit in whatsoeuer he shall moue and propound, for the establishing, confirmation, and inlargement, in all occasions, of those liberties and priuiledges which our subiects haue antiently enioyed by the benignitie of your selfe, and of your Royall ancestours. And in all other things and occasions, wherein hee hath or shall receiue our commands, as if our selfe did communicate them with you, which wee doubt not shall redound to the great vtilitie and honour of both our Empires. And so wee wish you health and true felicitie. Dated at our Royall Citie of London, the sixth day of September, Anno Dom. 1621, and of our Raigne of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, the nineteenth.

Articles propounded by the Embassadour to the Grand Seigniour. L.

I First, his sacred Maiestie of Great Britaine, according to the most noble and renowned league of amitie, betweene your Maiesties and your Crownes and Dominions, hath commanded me to renew the antient capitulations and priuiledges granted by your Imperiall Maiestie and your Royall ancestours, and therein to moone your Maiestie, that you will be pleased to enlarge and extend your fauour to our Nation that liue vnder your protection, and to giue remedie to diuers iniuries done vnto them by the Costomers of this Royall Port, Aleppo, Smirna, Scio, Petras, and other places, contra-rie to the Iustice and honour of your Maiestie: and that you will bee pleased to giue order for seuerall M commands to these places, in all our iust occasions; that both the fame of your iustice may be renowmed, and the friendship of your Maiesties confirmed, and the coresspondence and commerce betweene your Dominions established and encreased.

II Secondly, his Maiestie hath commanded me to offer himselfe as a mediatour of peace, to accommodate

A commodate the late breach with the Kingdome of Poland, the King of Poland hauing sent his Em-bassadour expresse into England to desire his aid, he hath thought it more agreeable to his honour and to the antient league of friendship, to vse his credit with your Maiestie to procure the generall quiet and peace of the Princes of Christendome; desiring your Maiestie to consider his interest in the publique cause, and not to despise the forces of so many as may partake in the quarrell: which if your Maiestie shall hearken vnto, the rather for his sake, as your royall Ancestor hath done in the like occasion, his Maiestie will accept it as a respect of your loue, which will assure and encrease the commerce and friendship of your Dominions; in which his Maiestie hath giuen me more particular and full instructions to treat and mediate in this businesse.

Thirdly, his Maiestie hath commanded me to moue your Imperiall Maiestie for the release of di- III
B uers of the Polish Nobilitie, now your Captiues; and for one Scottish Gentleman, a subiect of his Maiestie my Royall Master.

Fourthly, his Maiestie desires, that you will take some order with the Pyrats of Tunis and Al- IV giers, who shelter themselues vnder your Royall protection (to the great dishonour of your Maiestie) and doe many robberies vpon the subiects of Kings and Princes in amity and league with your empire, and take euen the ships sent vnto your Royall Port: admonishing your Maiestie to consider, that if they be suffered to continue, they will occasion the dissolution of all commerce and trade; being common enemies to all honest Merchants, by whom the friendship of these Kingdomes are maintained and increased. And that if your Imperiall Maiestie please not to exercise your Royall power and authori-tie to bridle or destroy them; that then you will not take it in ill part, that his Maiestie, with other C Princes his Allies, shall make an Armie to punish both them and all others that receiue and cherish them; which hath hitherto been forborne in respect onely of your Maiestie: and that the towns where they harbour themselues are or ought to be vnder your Imperiall command.

Fiftly, his Maiestie hath commanded me to require Iustice and restitution of a great summe of V money taken from Arthur Garaway here imprisoned by force and iniurie in the time of Achmet Bassa: whereof his Maiesties former Embassadours haue complained to Sultan Achmat, your Maiesties renowmed father, and to Mehemet Bassa Vizier, to Hussen Bassa, to the Hoja of the King, and to the Mufti; wherein your Maiesties most noble father gaue command for our satisfaction. All the said great Officers hauing heard the cause, vpon examination giuing their testimonies of the great wrong done vnto him; Mehemet Bassa also writing a letter, by the order of your Maiesties Royall D Father, promising iustice and restitution; which his Maiestie doth yet expect, and againe demand.
And hauing so often written in this cause, his Maiestie will not beleeue, but that in iustice and honour this Royall Court would do right; imputing the fault to his owne Ministers and Embassadors, that they neuer complained to your Imperiall Maiestie, according to his highnesse command. Also his Maiestie hath commanded me to require and desire your Maiestie to giue him your Royall answer in all these particulars, by your letters in writing, as shall be fit for your owne honour, and conformable to the antient league of amitie and friendship betweene your Royall Maiesties.

His Majesties Embassadour not many dayes after sent to the Visier, who had promised him an answer vnto these Articles; who returned him this that followeth.

E To the first he said, That the Emperour his Master had giuen him order to renew the Ca- The grand Seigniors answer.
pitulations, and to make any such additions as should be requisite, agreeable to their law, and conformable to the antient League; and that therein his Majesties Embassadour should finde no difficultie: for they honoured his Majestie, and were resolued to giue him assurance of their will to maintaine a true friendship; and therefore desired the Embassadour to draw and prepare the Capitulations, and send them to him and the Chancellour, who would consider them, and being such as were fit to be granted, the Embassadour should haue speedie order.

To the second, the Vizier answered with great subtiltie; First, iustifying the occasion of the warre, and imputing the fault to the Cossacks, maintained by the Pole to robbe euen at the port F of Constantinople: therefore that the Emperour could not in honour but chasten and destroy them, hauing first by message demanded iustice against them; and now his Master being ingaged with great charge, and in his honour he could make no peace with them who had beguil-led him: pretending that they had no other intention but the warre, because hauing raised his campe, and dissolued his Armie, the Polacks now scorned him, and kept no faith, neither sending Embassadour nor messenger, no not any Letter since their returne. That therefore they could not hearken to any condition: and that his Majestie of Great Britaine did not value the G honour of the grand Seigniour in this motion.

To the third, the Visier replied, That the motion for the prisoners was vnseasonable, because in order it should follow the Generall treatie, and making peace; which it finished, his Maiestie of Great Britaine should finde, that for his sake, all those mentioned in the Memoriall should bee free, except onely the Prince Coreskie, who had beene the cause of many troubles, and had made escape from prison formerly.

To the fourth, the Visier made protestation in the Grand Seigniours name against the Pyrats, offering that his Maesties Embassadour should haue what commands, what message he would desire in companie of any Englishman.

To the fifth the Visier replied, It was an old obsolete quarrell, and that the Embassadour did him injurie to presse him, when in the time of three former Visiers, his predecessors could H obtaine no relieue: therefore hee would not looke backe vpon the actions of other men, nor rake among the bones of the dead: but he desired the Embassadour should rest satisfied, that while He had the honour to gouerne, there should no wrong be done vnto the English Nation, and that hee would heare all complaints, so as no man should need to looke backe vpon his actions.

This perfunctorie answer, did not much satisfie his Maesties Embassador, but that he desired some other of effect, beeing loath to accept of generalities, and therefore required a direct reply for his own discharge: which was promised after much pressing, by the Visier who I had first vndertaken the same.

1622 The Polish Embassador expected at the Port.

The long stay of the Duke of Sbaraskie (chosen extraordinarie Embassadour by the King of Poland, to consummate the peace betweene him and the Grand Seigniour) did much trouble the Emperours Court; and especially the Visier, who procured the cessation of Armes, but that a letter was writ by the King of Poland, which did a little prolong their hopes. In the meane time the Emperour divulged a pretence to visite Mecha, the tombe of Mahomet his great Prophet; contrarie to the counsell and instance of all his Visiers that knew not the secret, and euen to the hazard of a generall reuolt; for they were jealous that vnder colour of that voyage, hee had some other designe; and it was feared, the Duke would not proceed to follow him at randome, nor treat with his Deputies left at the Port: For the Polacks seemed in performing and assuring the peace, a little too glorious of their good successe; and K the Nobilitie not so obedient to the King, as that he could absolutely command; which did both trouble their Agents at the Port, and discontent the Turkes: so that a little motion of the Cossackes or Tartars at that time (spoyle being both their liuelyhoods) had kindled new fires, and had disturbed or quite broken the peace.

In the meane space, the Grand Seigniour writ his letter to his Maiestie of Great Britaine, in answer to his royall letter by his Embassadour; wherein was contained a satisfactorie replie to all the particulers of those fiue articles deliuered vnto him. And the Grand Seigniour made such demonstration of great care to giue his Maiestie al content and satisfaction, that his L
Letter was presented to the Embassador with ceremonies of honor, requiring that it should be sent by an expresse messenger; and gaue command for a safe conduct for that purpose. The true translated coppie whereof doth immediatly follow.

Prince Osman euer victorious.

The Grand Seigniors letter to his Maiestie of great Britaine.

TO the mightie Prince, renowned among the Maiesties of the Princes of the Law of Iesus, obeyed of the great Potentates followers of the Messiah; the onely director of the important affaires of the Nazaren people; Soueraigne of the limites of power and honour; Lord of aduancement and authoritie, the most glorious IAMES, King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland; to whose last daies M
We wish all felicitie.

THis our Imperiall arriuing you shall know, that your houourable and famous Embassadaur, Sir Thomas Roe, is with your Royall and acceptable Letter come vnto our happie Port, the refuge of the Princes and Commanders of the World. Whereof the sincere contents and substance was, That our antient capitu[lations] should be renewed, and diuers articles therein reformed and explained, and some

And whereas certaine Customers and other officers of our Empire, haue often transgressed our Royall agreements, and done many violentes and iniuries to the Marchants your subiects, that for the time to come they may be secured from all oppression: and concerning the affaires of the Polacks, that the enmitie and warre lately begun betweene vs and them might be conuerted into peace and friendship; and that there should be established a sinure league and amitie, as in the time of our Ancestours. And that diuers Noblemen of Poland, and some of your Maesties Subiects now detained in our captiuitie, should be set at libertie. Complaining also against the Inhabitants of Tunis and Algier, That they who haue violated our Imperiall Capitulations, Amitie, and League, ought to be duely punished. And lastly, That whereas one of your subiects named* Arthur Garraway, from whom vpon a pretension there was a great fine taken, and other wrong done vnto

And the Peace being so established, your instances and desires for them shall haue gratefull acceptance with vs, and we will giue fit order for the prisoners.*

To the Beglerbeghs of Tunis and Algier, and to all other our slaues in those parts, we will presently send our expresse and high commaunds, and other orders, that they shall neuer hereafter transD gresse the tenour of our Imperiall Capitulations, nor commit any iniustice, nor do any violence to the Subiects of your Maestie. And concerning the businesse of the Merchant Arthur Garraway, wherein you haue informed vs, that there hath beene taken from him by oppression a great estate and faculties; in the time of our father Achmat Han of happie memorie (the Vizier Achmat Bassa being then Deputie here) vpon pretence that diuers Mussulmens goods were found in his hands: which cause being now ouerpassed many yeares, you require a new hearing and inquisition. By the grace of the great God it shall be reuewed and examined with all Iustice: in the processe and issue whereof you shall be assured to receiue a right and fit answer from your Embassador now remaining in our Court. And in our time we shall neuer permit, that any the least iniurie or iniustice shall be done to any. Giuening you assurance on our behalfe, that the foundation and nerues of peace, friendship, and League betweene vs, are of vs straitly preserued, continued, and encreased: and our amitie, correspondence, Giuen in our Imperiall Citie of Constantinople, the first day of the Moneth Gemaziel Achir (or Aprill) in the yeare of the departure of our Prophet Mahomet 1031; that is, Anno Christi Dei pari, 1622.

The Grand Seignour discontented since his disgrace in Poland, as soone as he came to Constantinople meditated reuenge vpon his souldiers, and alteration; and finding that his [illegible] for Mecha did not relish, gaue out that hee would passe into Asia to suppresse the Emir of Sidon, who had taken armes, and was reported to rebell; but indeed hauing secret intelligence with Osman and the Vizier Delaur Bassa. But from which purpose being dissuaded by the great instance of the Vizier, and that it would not so well serue his secret designes; hee returned to his first colour, that hee would visite Mecha the tombe of his false Prophet.

To make this voyage the more secure in apparance, hee seemed content to accept of any treatie with the Polacks, euen to conditions both of disaduantage and dishonour; for his estates in Hungarie, hee re-inforced the frontiers with diuers troupes; and although hee were much troubled at the league betweene the Emperour of Germanie and Bethlem Gabor, yet he dissembled it so, as that he would not displease the Transyluanian, but rather offered new succours, and forbearance of his tribute. From the incursions of the Cossackes hee hoped to assure himselfe by the treatie of the Poles; and in occasion of breach, hee had the Tartars ready to requite them; and for more securitie, hee added to the number of his gallies appointed to keep the Black sea. The common people and Visiers of the Port that loued rest, and knew not the designe, were much troubled and discontent at this iourney; and made many remonstrances to him of the inconuenience and danger, to leaue the seat of his Empire to the trust of a Deputie, in a time when Bethlem Gabor was newly reconciled to the Germane Emperour, and therefore not to be trusted; and the Pole newly reconciled to him, and therefore to bee mistrusted. Diuers other reasons were [illegible] to him, many petitions deliuered from the Church-men, Lawyers, and from all Estates. But melancholy reuenge had wholly possessed him, so that by no meanes he could be perswaded to desist. The souldierie passed so farre as to threaten publiquely, and to protest they would not follow, but rather set vp another King in his absence, that should stay among them. In conclusion, carried by his owne fate to destruction, hauing first commanded away his Armado to the Leuant, and thereby disposed many of his souldiers, vpon Wednesday the seuenth of May, hee began to passe ouer his tents and pauilions to Asia side, with great quantities of treasure. The Ianizaries and Spahies, who had also secret intelligence, vpon the King his owne words and actions betraying some further proiect than a Pilgrimage (for hee made preparations to carrie away all his iewels and treasure, euen defacing his pallace, and taking from Churches, and his Ward-robes whatsoeuer could be conuerted to Bullion) suddenly met at the Hippodrome in the citie, vpon a word giuen; and from thence ranne to the Seraglio in tumult, but without armes, and there according to their barbarous mutinies, cryed out for the the King; (hauing first taken order to stop the passage of any thing vpon the water) Who appearing to them, asked, What this insolencie meant, and what they pretended? They then, by the mouth of a multitude (for they had no head but that of the monster) demanded first, That he should not proceed in his purpose to goe to Mecha, nor into Asia, but that he would abide in the citie. Secondly, they required to haue deliuered to their furie, the great Visier Delauir Bassa, the Hoja or Confessor of the King, the Caslariaga Gouernour of the women, the Tefterdar or Treasurer, the Cadde leschar or chiefe Iustice, and some others, as enemies to the State, and consenting to this voyage, which they pretended would be the ruine of the Empire. The first, after a little dispute, the King granted vnto them, promising to giue ouer his iourney, but they not content, exacted it in writing. To the second hee replyed, That it was dishonour to him to haue his seruants so vsed without order of Iustice: but perswaded them to haue patience, to stay vntill Saturday, the next Diuan or publique Councell, where they should appeare, and if they were found culpable, they should receiue punishment; not meaning to performe any of this, but to get time, and allay their present furie. These fellows not content with this moderat answer, vndertooke to know that they were guiltie, and therefore that they needed no other witnesse, tryall, nor judge, but themselues; and with extreame clamour called to haue them rendered. But the King refusing to giue them any other satisfaction, and they vnprepared for force, returned into the citie, which now was all in feare, euerie house and shop shut vp, expecting a generall sacke. But they followed the way of their owne hatred, and first went into the house of the Hoja, which they brake and pillaged: But not

not finding him, they proceeded to the great Viziers, who made some defence, and they (being vnarmed) beat them off; and so they separated, being now euening, but yet kept a gard in some parts of the Towne.

That night the King made an attempt to send ouer to Asia side, but was preuented; and to fortifie and defend the Seraglio, which was strongly walled about, and had alway in it of household seruants about three thousand: but it seemed no man would arme himselfe in his cause; for the next morning the Mutiniers assembled againe, and taking their armes, went first to the Mufti, or Archpriest among them, and enforced him and diuers others to accompanie them to the Court, where they anew demanded these men, but with more instance and furie. In the meane time the Hoia, Cadeleschet, and Tefterdar fled, and were not in long time discouered. The Vizier retyred to the King, and perswaded him earnestly to go ouer in person in his owne boats (which from his garden he might easily do) to Asia, and there to take horse, and he would secure him from all perill; but the King would not moue, bidding him stay confident and assured that he would punish these Rebels.

The wise old man seeing this constancie or obstinacie, desired leaue to shift for himselfe; which he tooke or obtained, and so got away to the hermitage of a Saint renowmed amongst them; who (like himselfe) betrayed him, yet did him the fauour as not to deliuer him to the multitude, but perswaded and carried him backe to the Kings house. At this time it was disputed in the Seraglio about the deliuerie of those Officers; the Emperour refusing, the rebels clamouring and threatening; insomuch as he began to feare they would breake in, and in their rage do worse than was yet pretended. Whereupon (whether by the Kings order, or by his owne consent, willing to be the peace offering) the braue Vizier went out to them, and with a good assuredness demanded what they sought of him, and wherein he had offended. At first they were amased; but one insolent villaine breaking the generall modestie, they answered him with their swords, and suddenly cut him in pieces.

The Emperour seeing their furie so outragious, had now more cause to doubt, and retired himselfe, then too late, when he had lost his faithfull Counsellour; and would haue fled into Asia, but could not, yet he conueyed himselfe into a priuat place prepared by his Bostangi Bassa, or chiefe Gardiner. The Rebels continued without in their madnesse, asking for the King, and for more sacrifices. But the seruants protesting they knew not where he was, they said they must haue a King, and if he would not appeare they would make another: and hauing a while attended, they resolued to enter the Palace (but first tooke a generall oath not to sacke the Imperiall Throne, which they called their House and their Honour) and there seeking for the King, not able to finde him, they extorted by confession the Caslariaga, and slew him; and then they demanded for Mustapha, vncle to Osman, by him formerly deposed, a man esteemed rather holy (that is, franticke) than wise, and indeed fitter for a Cell than a Sceptre. The King the first day of this tumult had put Mustapha into a vault with two Negro women, without bread or drinke; in which estate these new Electors found him, almost naked, and halfe pined. At first sight he thought they had beene the messengers of death: but that feare passed ouer, and his first request was a cup of water. Whom they tooke vp, and instantly proclaimed him their Emperour; which he was loath to accept, in a manner ashamed to be raised to that dignitie. How vnstable are the estates of the greatest Princes! for hee that was but euen now in the iawes of death, naked, starued, and dying for thirst, is become a great Monarch, may drinke gold, or the innocent bloud.

The Ianizaries demand Mustapha.

They as yet not knowing what was become of Osman, and loth to trust Mustapha in the pallace, carried him in triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him; departing to the sacke of the Viziers house, and so in the euening to their Rendeuous, where they kept both good gard and good order in the citie, from fires and other insolencies. Sultan Osman amased with these newes, so soone as they had left the Court, came out, and called to councell in the night Hunewes, so soone as they had left the Court, came out, and called to councell in the night Hussein Bassa late Vizier in the Polish warre, and the Aga of the Ianizaries, both faithfull to him, and demanded their aduice: first hauing sent to the old Seraglio, to practise the women there to strangle Mustapha; but some of them taking his part, a new vprore began in the house betweene that Sex; and the souldiers that kept watch hearing the noyse, entred in and rescued him, and from thence remoued him to the chambers of the Ianizaries, where they garded him for that night in an ill lodging. All this while Osman consults what course to take. These two

The Ianizaries mutiny against the grand seigniour.

The great Vizier slaine by the Ianizaries.

The wise old man seeing this constancie or obstinacie, desired leaue to shift for himselfe; which he tooke or obtained, and so got away to the hermitage of a Saint renowmed amongst them; who (like himselfe) betrayed him, yet did him the fauour as not to deliuer him to the multitude, but persuaded and carried him backe to the Kings house. But the Ianizaries protested they knew not whose he was that they would haue a King, and if he would not appeare they would [illegible] [illegible] resolued, they resolued to enter the Palace but at length [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] King, not doubting [illegible] they [illegible] [illegible] demanded for [illegible] priuiledges. Delauir Bassa, a man of great wit and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

two his friends, and some others, tell him that the case was desperat, & could not be cured but G by a desperate remedie: and therefore they agreed, that the Aga should go and persuade, with the Mufti; and that the King in the morning should suddenly present himselfe to the soldiers at their owne dore, and make experience what his presence, his submission, and his beneuolence promised, could worke, to moue them to loyaltie or compassion. Which counsell early in the morning they put in practise. The King, accompanied with the Mufti (who neuer consented to his deposing, though he fauoured the souldiers against the Vizier) with Huzein Bassa, and about twelue horsemen, went directly to the Ianizaries Colledge, where Mustapha was kept, and there in teares made them an Oration; offering great recompence, repenting of his errour, and finally inuoked them by the merits of his father and all his Ancestours, to haue some pitty vpon their true Master. The multitude (tam prona in misericordi[a] tam quam im- H modica sæuitia fuerat; sometimes as prone to pitty as they were before to hatred) now knew not what to do; a silent murmure now ranne among them, and they were halfe conuerted: but the Aga of the Ianizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead vnseasonably for him, with some harsh words of vpbraidure (vt natura maris omni flatu venti turbida; as the nature of the sea is to swell with euery blast of wind) anew moued their furie, so that they cried out Treason, and fell vpon him and Huzein Bassa and cut them into pieces, euery man taking a part of their flesh to satiate their reuenge. The Mufti would speake, but was with-drawne by some, for respect to his place, and with difficul[ty] was conueyed away. Now the poore Osman saw his friends slaine, and knew not which [way] to conuert himselfe, but binding vp his eyes with a napkin, expected death as the last of [their] furie. But they carried him I first before Mustapha, and accused him as the disturber of the peace of the Empire, and demanded sentence against him (More vulgi suum quisque flagitium alijs obiectans) The forsaken Prince pleaded for life, and the new king knew not how to condemne, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At last they consulted with themselues, and put him vpon an horse (an insolent Spahi changing turbants with him) and sent him away prisoner to the seuen towers, vnder good gard (in his passage begging a draught of water at a fountaine) and then returned to their new master, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperial Throne; where hee had need to haue good broaths and nourishment to restore his decayed bodie.

Daout Bassa strangleth Sultan Osman in prison.

The souldiers now thought all was done, and (onely sacking the houses of Huzein Bassa K and some others their conceiued enemies) returned in quiet to their seuerall lodgings, and had no further malice. But the new Vizier Daout Bassa, made by Mustapha, knew well, if Osman liued, that this storme might passe ouer, and he would as easily, and by the same meanes returne to his estate, as he fell from it (vulgus vt mos est cuiúsque nouit motus cupidum:) Therefore he consulted with some few interessed in Mustapha's preferment, and thereby obnoxious to Osman, to search how many of the Royall bloud were left aliue, and resolued if there remained two, to make an end of Osman. Two of his brothers were found, the one about twelue, * the other about seuen yeares of age: and thereupon the Vizier went himselfe to the prison with a packe of hangmen, and gaue order to strangle the vnfortunate Prince: who now hauing had no rest in two nights, and thinking himselfe secure for a season, was newly falne asleepe: but awaked by the comming of these messengers, asked, What newes? saying hee did L not like their sudden intrusion. They at first stood amased, and the king made shew to defend himselfe; But a strong knaue strook him on the head with a battle-ax, and the rest leaping vpon him, strangled him with much ado. Thus one of the greatest Monarchs in the world was first affronted by mutined troups, his owne slaues, almost vnarmed, and few in number, no man taking vp a sword to defend him: and they who began this madnesse, not meaning to hurt him, by the increase of their owne furie, which had no bounds, deposed him against their owne purpose, and at last exposed his life, against their will, to the counsels of other men whom they equally hated. And now they mourned for their dead King as freshly, as they raged vnreasonably; knowing they had stained their honour, being the first of their Emperors they euer betrayed, and that they had set vp another that in all likelyhood they must change M for disabilitie. Nunquam tulit documenta fors maiora quam fragili loco starène superbi.

This was the last act of the life of Sultan Osman; but his intents and great designes, which drew vpon him this fatall blow, will not be vnworthy the communication: the practises, reasons, secrets, and consc[ience] of all actions, being the soule of Historie, and res gesta but the bare

A bare carkasse: and, as many ages haue not produced so strange an example of the incertaintie of humane greatnesse, so in the disposition thereof, and in the waies leading thereunto, there was seene euidently the wonderfull prouidence of God, in confounding the counsels of the worldly wise, who had layed a foundation of new greatnesse, whereby this Prince aspired the vniuersall Monarchie. And lastly, the World may see vpon how weake foundations this Monarchie was at first builded, how easily it was now shaken and corrupted; how their Kings are subiect to the rage of a few slaues, how Anarchie hath prepared it an easie prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the inuasion of Poland all these changes tooke their beginning. Sultan Osman aduanced to the Throne in his youth, full of heat and bloud, being of a great and haughtie spirit, verie couragious, strong of bodie, and a mortall hater of Christi-B ans, enuious of the glorie of his ancestors, and ambitious to raise his name aboue any of theirs, had proiected in himselfe the conquest of the remaines of the bordering Europe. But to so great designes, he had one vice that resisted al hope of prosperity, which was, extreme auarice; vnnaturall to youth, and a symptome of the decrepit age of monarchs: Vbi viri luxu corrum- pebantur, contra veterem disciplinam & instituta maiorum apud quos virtute quàm pecunia res mi-litaris melius stetit. His first enterprise was that of Poland, moued by the incursions of the Cossackes; which then he vndertooke of his owne head, without the counsell of any his Viziers (who in a tyrannie growne to the height, by ease and wealth, are euer corrupt and la-zie) and against the liking of all the souldiers, who (contrarie to their institution being married and fathers of families, entered into trades, receiuing nothing in warre more than in peace, C besides danger and trauell) are not easily drawne from their owne chimneyes. This action he thought so easie, as he had disposed of his conquest, and diuided the liue Lyons skinne.
But being met vpon the borders with a poore armie in comparison, hee was first arrested at Chotyn, a little fortresse, which he was faine to leaue behinde him vntaken; and then seeking to aduance into the plaine Countrey, by forcing the trenches of the Chancellour of Poland opposed against him, he could neuer procure his Ianizaries to fight, though ingaging his person once or twice beyond the regard of his qualitie, and his owne troupes readie to mutine against him nor to forsake him he was at last enforced to raise shamefully his camp, and to accept of any treatie to saue his outward honor. In this attempt he lost aboue 100000 horses for want of fodder, and eightie thousand men for want of fighting: for they would rather die D running, or pillaging, or eating, than in the face of the enemie. For this disgrace he conce-ued so inward and rooted an indignation against the Ianizaries, and so iustly, that he often lamented himselfe, and complayned he was no King that was subiect to his owne slaues, vp-on whom hee spent great treasures, and yet they would neither fight in warre, nor obey in peace, without exacting new bounties and priuiledges. Delauir Bassa, a man of great wit and courage, lately called from the Easterne parts, where he had long gouerned with honor, who came in, though late, yet in a verie braue and warlike equipage, aboue all other his captaines, was suddenly made great Vizier, the former Huzein Bassa being in the same disgrace common with the souldier, though not in the same fault. This man was neuer bred at court, but had liued many yeares in action, and so had neither faction nor dependance at the Port, but E stood vpon himselfe and his owne merit: and being now vnexpectedly aduanced to this high dignitie, he wrought vpon the Kings discontent, and nourished it: and in conclusion brake with him, That it was true he was no Emperour, nor could be safely aliue, while the Ianiza-ries had the power which they lately vsurped: informing him, That they were corrupted from their antient institution, and were lazie cowards, giuen ouer to ease and lust: Et animi per libidines corrupti nihil honestum inanit. But if his Maiestie would pull vp his spirits, and follow his aduice, he would prouide him a new souldioury about Damascus, Coords, of men euer bred in the frontier, with hardnesse and warre, of great courage and experience; and that of them he should erect a new Militia, that should wholly depend of him, entertaining onely fortie thousand in pay, which should alway be his guard: and that in the distribution of eue-F rie Prouince, he should constitute that the Begler-begh in his gouernment should traine some of the inhabitants, who in all occasions of making a great armie, should be in readinesse, and thereby he should spare infinite treasures spent vpon these drones that eat vp his estate; and with men of new spirits and hopes, he should be enabled to doe greater matters than any of his ancestours: but withall he desired the King to communicate this counsell to no man, nor to truſt his life vpon anothers ſecrecie. Delauir Baſſa neuer reuealing himſelfe to any but the king, who extreamely pleaſed with this aduice, that flattered his owne humour, conſented, and remitted all to the Viziers direction, who was a true ſouldier, and a verie wiſe man, able by his credit in Aſia, to performe all he had vndertaken: for hee was exceedingly beloued in thoſe parts, verie rich, and had kept Damaſcus, whereof he was Gouernour, for himſelfe in a late rebellion. Vpon this concluſion betweene them, it was firſt agreed, That the King ſhould pretend to goe in perſon either to viſite Mecha, or againſt the Emir de Sidon, who was mooued to take armes really to aſſiſt in the deſigne; but they vſed it to colour the departure of the Emperour: which when it was well weighed, was found, that then the armie of the Ianizaries muſt be kept together, which could not agree with their ends. Heereupon the journey of the Pilgrimage was divulged, That the King might [illegible] the ſhadow of an holy deuotion goe out with a ſmall traine, and diſperſe thoſe who [illegible] ſuſpected to him. And for this, preparation was made, but ſomewhat to groſſely; by melting of all the Plate, Saddles, furniture of houſe, Lampes of Churches, and whatſoeuer could more eaſily be conueyed away in mettall, with all the jewels and treaſurie. This gaue the firſt ſuſpition, which was confirmed by diuers vnaduiſed words let fall from the King; of diſdaine againſt the cowardiſe of the Ianizaries, and that he would ſhortly find himſelfe ſouldiers that ſhould whip them: and laſtly, diſmiſſing all his houſehold, except ſome few elect, the diſcontented ſort obſerued this and betrayed him. Delauir Baſſa kept his owne ſecret, and in the mean time prepared by his friends in Aſia ten thouſand men; about D[illegible]ſcus ten thouſand, from the Coords, beſides thoſe in readineſſe of the Emir de Sidon; a[illegible] vpon pretence of defending the borders of Perſia, who might make ſome aduantage of the changes in thoſe parts: and gaue order, That all theſe ſhould meet the King at Damaſcus, where he would preſently cut off his guard and ſtay there, vntill he had regulated his new armie and diſcipline, and then to returne triumphant to Conſtantinople, and vtterly root out the order of Ianizaries, Spahies, and Timariots, and to exauctorate all their captaines and officers, to ſettle a new Gouernement, and to change the name of the citie. And theſe things ſucceeding, he then reſolued with his new ſouldiers to attempt the recouerie of his honor in Chriſtendome; in the meane time to hold a diſſembled friendſhip there in all parts. Certainely this was a braue and well grounded deſigne, and of great conſequence for renewing of that decayed Empire, languiſhing vnder the inſolencies of lazie ſlaues, if God had not deſtroyed it: it being verie true, That the Turkiſh Emperour ſtands at the deuotion of his owne troupes for peace, or warre, life or death, and is in effect nothing but the Steward or Treaſurer of the Ianizaries. If this project had taken effect, what euents it might haue produced by a ciuill warre, is not eaſie to judge. For doubtleſſe the Souldiorie would haue ſet vp another King, and maintained him as well as they could; and the Europeian part had beene in danger to haue beene torne away by the the diuiſion. Beſides, Delauir Baſſa hauing the King and the treaſurie in his poſſeſſion, and his owne credit ſo great, and his inclination velle imperare, ſo willing to beare rule, once diſcouered, it might well be thought that hee had ſome ends of his owne to ſhare a part of this mightie eſtate: if on the other ſide the Viſier had proued true and faithfull, the reformation and new erection of the diſcipline of warre, and the encreaſe of treaſure conſequent to the diſmiſſion of the old Militia, would haue been fearefull to all Chriſtendome; but Vbi eſt ſapiens? vbi diſquiſitor ſæculi huius? Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, & vanam reddam intelligentiam intelligentium. It is a great queſtion whether then was the wiſer wiſh, That theſe counſels had ſucceeded, or not: for either diuiſion and ſubuerſion, or a new proſperitie and enlargement of their dominion had neceſſarily followed.

Obſeruations vpon Sultan Oſman.

Some obſeruations vpon this occaſion, will not be impertinent to thoſe that deſire to know aſwell the diſpoſition and vſe, as the things themſelues. Firſt in the purpoſe of the ſouldier, not at all to violate or hurt the King, much leſſe to depoſe and murder him; but onely to take away thoſe about him whom they though aſſiſtants in this proiect: yet the furie once on foot, they proceeded by miſſenſible ſteps, to the vttermoſt of outrage, againſt many innocents in that buſineſſe, though otherwiſe obnoxious, [illegible] againſt the throne and life of their owne Emperour, Vbi furor ingruat, innocentes ac noxios [illegible] cadêre; where rage and furie hath got the vpper hand, there the innocent and nocent fare alike. Secondly in the degrees; that yet the King had not fa[illegible] thus low, if firſt he had not loſt that owe and reuerence which alway

A alway attendeth vpon Maieſty, if it be kept vp, by vnſeemly offices done by him in the ſtreets and Tauernes, apprehending many ſouldiers for petty faults; like a Conſtable, making his perſon common, cheape, and deſpiſed among them; which were wont only to be ſeene and feared, as ſomewhat aboue humane greatneſſe. And this he did alſo in hatred and diſdaine of thoſe that had in the warre forſaken him. And now in this laſt act, if his owne obſtinacy had not plunged him into deſtruction, but that he had ſoftened them by a ſeaſonable yeelding to time, he had preuailed onely by time. Thirdly in the order, that theſe Mutiniers hauing no head or direction, kept that reglement, that they tooke oath in their furie, in hot bloud, in the Kings yard, not to diſhonour, ſpoile, nor ſacke the Imperiall Throne, neither committed nor ſuffered any inſolence nor violence in the citie to the Neutrals, but rather proclaimed peace
B and iuſtice. Fourthly in the conſequents, that at the third dayes end all was quiet, and all men in their trade, as if no ſuch thing had happened; onely the Ianizaries ſuffered no Diuan nor Councell vntill they had receiued a donatiue or guerdon of their iniquitie. In which alſo the infinite waſte of treaſure is worthie the conſideration, which was exceedingly exhauſted by three changes in foure yeares, and by the late warres in Perſia and Poland; for euery Ianizarie in the Citie, abſent or preſent (whoſe rolle was about fourtie thouſand) receiued twentie fiue Checquines of gold; beſides the Spahies, Iamoglans, and other Orders, at euery alteration: which amounts in all neere to two millions. And now thoſe fellowes that had taſted the ſweet of proſperous mutinies (haud ignari ſumma ſcælera incipi cum periculo peragi cum præmio) tooke ſuch a head, as could not ſafely be ſuffered on, nor ſecurely be taken off. Fiſtly, of C certain preſages that foreran: for Oſman dreamed in the night, That he though the rid a camell, and being mounted, he could not force him to go by faire means nor ſtripes: and that when hee deſcending in a rage, the bodie of the beaſt vaniſhed, and left the head in the Kings hand. Who next day troubled at this fancie, ſent to a learned man familiar with him, for the interpretation. He excuſed himſelfe, as vnfit to giue opinion in a matter of that conſequence; but perſuaded Oſman to enquire of the Mufti. He alſo craued pardon; but withall ſaid, there was none ſo fit to interpret it as Muſtapha the Kings vncle, who was eſteemed a holy man, that had viſions and Angel-like ſpeculations (in plaine tearmes, betweene a mad man and a foole.) The King repaired to Muſtapha, who briefely told him, The Camell ſignified his Empire: his riding, abuſe in gouernment: his diſſention, his diſpoſition: the vaniſhing of the Bodie, the reuolt of his Sub-
D iects: the Head remaining in his hand, onely a bare title; and that hee ſhould ſhortly die within a few moneths, and loſe his Kingdome, but the emptie name of Emperour ſhould accompanie him to his graue.

A ſecond of leſſe conſequence in the Vizier Delauir Baſſa; from whom his Maieſties Embaſſadour hauing receiued particular friendſhip, about ſix dayes before this vprore, he went to viſit; and hauing no other buſineſſe but to perſuade him to ſtay the King from this intended pilgrimage, the Embaſſadour gaue him many reaſons in the preſent eſtate of their owne affaires; eſpecially, the Treaty of Poland yet depending. To which the Baſſa replied very graiely. Then the Embaſſadour vrged the feare of ſome tumult, collected from the licentious ſpeeches rumoured in the towne: And he was bold to deale plainly, ſincerely, and friend-
E ly, That if any ſuch thing ſhould happen, the fault would be imputed to the Baſſa, in being of authoritie to perſuade the King; whom his qualitie and youth would excuſe, [illegible] the fury would be diſcharged vpon the greateſt Miniſter: deſiring him to conſider the euent, at leaſt to take his affection in the beſt part.

The old Reinard ſtayed a while from reply: at laſt, ſmiling to himſelfe, that he ſhould be perſuaded againſt that which was his owne counſell, he gaue a finall anſwer, That there was no remedie, he durſt not hazard himſelfe to oppoſe the Kings reſolution: but aſſured him he would ſo order the matter, as this iourney ſhould not proceed ſo farre as was expected. The Embaſſadour concluded for himſelfe, deſiring then that he would leaue him a particular recommendation to the Chimacham or Deputie as his friend. To which he ſuddenly replied, F Trouble not your ſelfe, nor feare; I will neuer remoue ſo farre but thou ſhalt [illegible] this citie to ſerue you. Which the poore man fulfilled; for being [illegible] within re[illegible] after, one of his legs whole and entire was hanged [illegible] the Hippodrome, place of the citie.

The reading of hiſtorie, to know what is donne and paſt, hauing in itſelfe no recompence but delight, vnleſſe it looke forward to vſe and action, either to correct errours, or by that light to gather aduantage in future, it will not be an vnprofitable degreſſion to obſerue what was like to ſucceed theſe monſtrous alterations. It was feared by contemplatiue men, that the ſouldiers in Aſia, who had loſt their hope, would not ſit downe with this affront, but rather attempt ſome reuenge for the death of the King, who was their martyr: or that ſome great Baſſa, farre remoued from Court, might apprehend this occaſion, not to obey an vſurper, ſet vp by treaſon; and vnder that colour to hide their owne ambition: or laſtly, that the whole State would fall into combuſtion, and inteſtine warre. This they themſelues foreſaw, and it came to paſſe, as will appeare in the ſtorie; for within few moneths Abaſſa Baſſa of Arſorome declared himſelfe reuenger of his Princes bloud, and troubled, and almoſt hazarded the whole Empire. The Perſian apprehended the opportunities, and recouered the Prouince and Citie of Babylon: and the ſame Souldiers that had betrayed their Prince, were neuer quiet vntill they had made ſome ſatisfaction, by reſtoring his brother and right heire: onely it pleaſed not God to open the eys of Chriſtian Princes to ſee the inconuenience of their own vnciuill quarrels, while the diſtractions of this mightie Empire did inuite to conquer it, and to diuide it as a proſtituted prey.

A practiſe to murther the brethren of Sultan Oſman.

On Saturday euening the firſt of Iune following, the Capi-aga or Maior Domo of the Seraglio, hauing receiued a ſecret order to remoue the brethren of Oſman from their lodgings, and in the night to ſtrangle them; as he was performing his command, aided with a few of his carnifices to carrie away the Princes, they cried out: the Pages running to the noiſe, and incouraged by the Caſſiaraga, who had ſome ſuſpition, without further examination killed the Capiaga, now almoſt euerie Order hauing riſen againſt their owne head. That night they ſent ſecretly to the Ianizaries and Spahies, to informe them what they had done; and in the morning early hanged his bodie in the Hippodrome for a publique ſpectacle. The ſouldiers returned in furie to the Court, in fauour of the Pages, and demanded juſtice againſt thoſe that had conſented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; onely this Muſtapha being left aliue, who was ſo holy a Saint, that he would not people the world with ſinners, nor endure any woman neere him. The innocent King proteſted hee knew nothing of this purpoſe: and if ſuch command were procured, it was gotten by ſubreption; and he was eaſily beleeued. But his mother, another Liuia, and the new Vizier, Daout Baſſa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently ſuſpected. It was a day of Diuan or Councell; but the ſouldiers would ſuffer none, vntill they had an account of this treaſon. The Vizier denied all; the mother was a woman, and hidden in the houſe: yet it is very likely, they both were guiltie, to vphold and ſecure their owne authoritie; it being rumoured, that the Vizier determined to place ſubditiouſly in the roome of the elder Prince, his owne ſonne, and verie like him, and ſo to gouerne Muſtapha for a time, and by his remoue to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his race for euer. But now ſomewhat muſt be done to appeaſe the people; therefore Daout Baſſa, was degraded from his office, and one Huzein Baſſa, newly arriued from the gouernment of Cairo, aduanced to his place, with promiſe of further examination. But the furie once ouer, there was no great ſearch nor diſcouerie made, for perhaps the Sultans checquines quieted the matter. The new Vizier was a man without friends, yet verie rich, of a ſtubborne and obſtinate nature, reported iuſt in his waies, but peremptorie and vnflexible (Audax ferox, ac prout animum intendit, prauus aut induſtrius eadem vi) one from whome all men might expect much good, or much ill: he beguh his gouernement roughly, and vndertooke to puniſh inſolencies early, and profeſſed a reformation, or to be a ſacrifice: A man fit for thoſe times that were deſperate: for the worſt was, that he muſt at laſt endure their furie. In the meane time he procured a little awe, & reſtored the face of juſtice: yet it was thought it could not laſt long, the Ghoſt of Oſman would not be at reſt vntill there were ſome parentalia made vnto him. The nature of the Vizier was vnſupportable; but if he preuailed, and were once ſetled, hee reſolued a new to change the King, and lay an obligation vpon the brethren of Oſman; for he did neuer thinke himſelfe ſecure vnder a man gouerned by an inſolent woman, dominandi auida, deſirous to rule. And what aſſurance could he haue in that prince, in whom there was neither judgement nor hatred, but as it was infuſed? And though the particulars could not be foreſeene, nor where the ſore would breake out, yet the whole bodie was ſicke, their King

A King being mentis inops, an Ideot; and the next in expectation a childe vnfit for action, and all the great men and ſouldiers decayed, mutined, and corrupted.

In the meane time, the Duke of Sbarasky came neere vnto the borders of the Turkiſh Empire, and ignorant of thoſe great changes which had happened, ſent a ſeruant with a letter to the dead Vizier Delauir Baſſa, with whom onely the Poles had treatie. The contents were, That the king of Poland had ſent him to conclude a peace, vpon ſuch conditions as were agreed vpon by the Vizier and the Commiſſioners of Poland, ſigned on both parts; but that it was reported vpon the death of the Grand Seigniour, that the new gouernment was varied from ſome of them; that he had no other inſtructions to treat anew; but if he would giue his word to the Engliſh Embaſſadour, that there was no alteration in the intents of peace, hee
B was ready to ſet forward on his journey. This letter receiued by the new Vizier, was Greeke to him, who was lately come from Cairo, and vnderſtood no article nor piece of the buſineſſe; which was ſo ſecretly carried by Delauir Baſſa, that Sultan Oſman and he being dead, there was no man had ſo much as a copie, or knew the ſubſtance of that agreement: ſo that the Vizier giuing good words, aſhamed to confeſſe his ignorance, promiſed all things, but knew not what to write in particular anſwer, and therefore was at a ſtand. The meſſenger neuertheleſſe importuned a diſpatch, the which he had in generall termes, and ſo returned againe to the Duke his Maſter vpon the confines.

The Poliſh Embaſſador approcheth vpon the confines and writeth to the dead Vzier.

With this Nuntio, the Duke wrot to Sir Thomas Roe; and being verie doubtfull to entangle himſelfe in this vnſetled gouernment, deſired him both to councell him, and to tell the Vi-
C zier, that he would not aduance vnleſſe he might receiue ſuch aſſurance of ſafety and publique faith, as that he might engage his credit to him: hoping thereby to haue both aſſiſtance and witneſſe in all his proceeding. Which gaue the Viſier occaſion to entreat the Engliſh Embaſſadour, both to promiſe for the good vſage of the Duke, and to haſten him, and alſo to enforme himſelfe by him of the ſubſtance of the treatie of Chotyn; which being by him vndertaken, it turned to the great aduantage of both, eſpecially of the Peace it ſelfe.

The prince Coreſky ſtrangled in priſon.

The ſeuenteenth of Iune in the morning the Prince Coreskie, one of the Lords of Poland, taken priſoner in the late warre, recommended by his Maieſtie of Great Britaine, who had formerly made an eſcape from the Turkes captiuitie, was ſtrangled in the priſon, after two yeares of durance. This put all into murmure, and deepe conſideration, for what politique
D end this ſhould be done, euen when they themſelues deſired a peace with the Pole, and yet did that which might vtterly breake the ſame: But it ſeemed they were at that time either carried with a brutiſh furie, or that the Prince was betrayed from home, by imitation that his remuant nature would neuer ſuffer the peace long to continue betweene the Crowne of Poland and the Grand Seigniour.

The Vizier attempteth to ſet vp Morat the brother of Oſman, and to depoſe Muſtapha.

The Vizier (who cauſed this Polacke Prince to be ſtrangled) vpon ſome ſpleene towards the Aga or chiefe Captaine of the Ianizaries, took this occaſion to caſt the fault on him, and to caſſiere him; & ſent him to the Iſlands to be ſtrangled; & gaue order to murder ſome other Baſaes & Officers, and that way being made to depoſe the Emperor Muſtapha, to ſet vp Morat the childe, and brother of Oſman, many being of his partie. Wherupon the ſoldiers, roſe all in arms
E at the Seraglio, taking the alarme at the medling with the Aga, reſcued their captaine, and the reſt, and demanded the head of the Vizier: wheruponhe fled, and order was giuen to kil him where he could firſt be found. The ſouldiers alſo required the letter of Morat, Aga Cuſtomer, and diuers others; but for feare of other complices, they durſt ſearch no further into the conſpiracie; onely the Viziers houſe was ſacked, and infinite treaſure taken, ſo that the ſouldier was quieted for a day or two by making a new Vizier, Muſtapha Baſſa; who was of a ſoft nature, and ſcarce durſt doe juſtice for feare of offending any man. Now a new faction was made betweene Muſtapha and Morat; and it was expected hourely when there ſhould bee ſome great ſlaughter or maſſacre in the Citie; for of neceſſitie one ſide muſt fall.

F There was then no ſecuritie for any man; when the King and Viziers, and all officers held their liues and dignities at the courteſie of the mutined ſouldier, who had taſted the ſweet of rebellion, and caſt off all awe and reuerence, and could not eaſily be reduced to order, without much bloud and hazard of the whole. Therefore the wiſer men retired from office and imployment, and the inſufficient did cauſe their owne daily change and ruine. The ſouldier adhered

That night they ſent ſecretly to the Ianizaries and Spahies, to informe them what they had done; and in the morning early hanged his bodie in the Hippodrome for a publique ſpectacle. The ſouldiers returned in furie to the Court, in fauour of the Pages, and demanded juſtice againſt thoſe that had conſented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; onely this Muſtapha being left aliue, who was ſo holy a Saint, that he would not people the world with ſinners, nor endure any woman neere him. The innocent King proteſted hee knew nothing of this purpoſe: and if ſuch command were procured, it was gotten by ſubreption; and he was eaſily beleeued. But his mother, another Lamia, and the new Vizier, Daout Baſſa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently ſuſpected. It was a day of Diuan or Councell; but the ſouldiers would ſuffer none, vntill they had an account of this treaſon. The Vizier denied all; the mother was a woman, and hidden in the houſe: yet it is very likely, they both were guiltie, to vphold and ſecure their owne authoritie; it being rumoured, that the Vizier determined to place ſubditiouſly in the roome of the elder Prince, his owne ſonne, and verie like him, and ſo to gouerne Muſtapha for a time, and by his remoue to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his race for euer. But now ſomewhat muſt be done to appeaſe the people; therefore Daout Baſſa, was degraded from his office, and one Huzein Baſſa, newly arriued from the gouernment of Cairo, aduanced to his place, with promiſe of further examination. But the furie once ouer, there was no great ſearch nor diſcouerie made, for perhaps the Sultans checquines quieted the matter. The new Vizier was a man without friends, yet verie rich, of a ſtubborne and obſtinate nature, reported iuſt in his waies, but peremptorie and vnflexible (Audax, ferox, ac prout animum intendit, prauus aut induſtrius eadem vi) one from whome men might expect much good, or much ill: he begun his gouernement roughly, and vndertooke to punish inſolencies early, and profeſſed a reformation, or to be a ſacrifice: A man fit for thoſe times that were deſperate: for the worſt was, that he muſt at laſt endure thei[illegible] time he procured a little awe, & reſtored the face of juſtice: yet it was [illegible] long, the Ghoſt of Oſman would not be at reſt vntill there were ſome [illegible] him. The nature of the Vizier was vnſupportable; but if he preuailed [illegible] hee reſolued a new to change the King, and lay an obligation vpon the [illegible] for he did neuer thinke himſelfe ſecure vnder a man gouer[illegible] by an infolent word, [illegible] audi auidi, deſirous to rule. And what aſſurance could he [illegible] in that prince, in whi[illegible] there was neither judgement nor hatred, but as it was infuſed? And though the particular [illegible] not be foreſeene, nor when the ſore would breake out, yet the whole bodie was ſicke, [illegible] they may be confirmed and maintained. And not doubting but your Maieſtie will reſtraine the Tarlike Sultan Soly[illegible]man, and his ſucceſſours, the father and brother of your Maieſtie; the Princes of Mol-dauia,

adhered to the King of their owne creation, and hee was in effect their creature, for they did wholely gouerne him. But the Lawyers and Church-men made ſecret conuentions, and ſtill practiſed ſome great alteration; and feared not to ſay openly, that the foundation of their State was diſſolued, the King vnlawfull, and all that had adhered vnto him lapſed into hereſie, hauing diſpiſed the inſtitutions of Mahomet. They wrought by wiſe counſels, and held a large correſpondencie with thoſe of their owne coat, and ſpread their confederacie to all parts of the Empire to procure a faction, and kindle a greater fire than that of the ſouldiers: for at Bagdat the captaine of the Ianizaries roſe and ſlew the Baſſa, burnt the Mufti and all his kinne, and gaue his daughter in marriage to one Aſlan Begh, a pretender to the antient inheritance of a bordering prouince, to cautionize that part. All Aſia was in doubt whom to obey; and Cairo was eaten vp with oppreſſion; and that which was moſt dangerous, they had no ſence of the ſickneſſe in the Court, to cure it, nor any of them ſo wiſe as to diſſemble it.

The prince of Tranſyluania's Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

The two and twentieth of Auguſt, the extraordinarie Embaſſador of Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania arriued at Conſtantinople; who amongſt other Inſtructions had order to excuſe his Maſter, and to declare the reaſons why he had made peace with the Emperour without the knowledge of the Port: which were, That the warre had continued three yeares in the kingdome of Hungarie, and had ſo conſumed and deſolated the countrey, that it was impoſſible for him to ſtay longer in the field, and to maintaine an armie, for the great famine and ſcarcitie of all things which the Souldierie ſuffered, and could from no place be ſupplied: ſo that if he had not accepted of peace offered, he had been enforced to quit the countrey of neceſſitie, and by his ſeeming flight haue left the enemie victor. Therefore he was conſtrained to winne time, and to returne into Tranſyluania, to refreſh his men of warre, and to re-inforce them; as alſo his owne preſſing affaires calling him backe, his brother whom hee had left Gouernour in his abſence, hauing aduiſed him, That the King of Poland, by the inſtigation of the Emperor, by intelligence with ſome of the principall Lords, did practiſe a reuolt, and promiſed aid to make a new Prince that ſhould wholly depend vpon the Empire and Poland. Laſtly, ſeeing the Grand Seignior had ſuddenly concluded a peace with the Poles, he feared he ſhould be left alone to the burthen of the warre, in which the King of Poland, being at eaſe, might aſſiſt the Emperour, which he was not able to ſuſtaine. Therefore hee was content to take the opportunitie to accept of that, at the inſtance of the Emperour, which hee ſhould haue been forced to do by neceſſity.

Yet afterward, although he made this Apologie for his Maſter, for concluding a peace, he aſſured the Port, that his Maſter meant not long to keepe the ſame: informing them, that the Emperour had made a League (being at that time quiet in Germanie) to inuade the Ottoman Empire: perſuading the Port to grant a Commiſſion with ful power and authoritie to him and the Baſſa of Buda (who had been twentie yeares in that charge, and knew all the borders) if they ſaw it fit, to preuent the Enemie, and to inuade the Empire or the kingdome of Poland. This demand was made by Gabor to inſinuate with the State of Turkie, and to get a power dormant in his hands, to aduance into Hungarie if he ſaw aduantage, or to oblige the Emperour; and to aſſure his peace, by hauing meanes not to care if it were broken. But the Grand Seignior finding himſelfe, by reaſon of ciuile diſtractions at home, vnfit for a warre abroad, and that they ſaw Bethlem Gabor had no other thing in recommendation than his owne deſignes and fortune, his Embaſſadours Propoſitions began to be altogether sleighted and neglected.

The Poland Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

The Duke of Sbarasky, who came to conclude the peace betweene his Maſter the King of Poland, and the Grand Seignior, after long ſtay vpon the confines, did at length arriue at the Port; but they made him ſtay fiue weekes before he could haue audience, forcing him to giue a Preſent, contrary to his inſtructions. Notwithſtanding he could not get them to enter into a Treatie, finding nothing but falſehood and vncertaintie among them, no promiſe nor faith kept, no priſoners deliuered, nor indeed any thing at all performed: for now that they had him within their liberties, they hoped to worke their owne ends, and to wearie him out, who had twelue hundred of his ordinarie traine. They threatened to keepe him, and to denounce a warre againſt his Maſter: yet by the mediation of the Engliſh Embaſſadour, the Miniſters of the Port and he were pieced again, and the peace concluded, as ſhall be hereafter ſet downe at large.

After

A After many difficulties to obtaine admiſſion to the preſence of the Grand Seignior, cauſed by the frowardneſſe of the old Eunuch Georgi Mehemet Baſſa, then great Vizier; who diſcouering that the Duke would complaine againſt Tomſha Vayuod of Valachia, and his Creature, endeauoured by all fraud, cunning, threatening, and faſtidious delayes, to diuert him from that purpoſe; being loath that the actions of him whom he had foſtered and maintained in many tyrannies, eſpecially in the occaſion of the laſt warre, ſhould be examined or layed open to Iuſtice. But when he ſaw that nothing could preuaile, but that he muſt hazard a direct breach by the diſcontent of the Duke; and that the people began to murmure, and the Engliſh Embaſſadour to protect him, he was admitted, and nobly receiued, according to the pompous cuſtome of that Court; and with his Letter of Credence he ſpake theſe following B words.

The Oration of the Duke of Sbarasky to the Graund Seigniour.

SIGISMVND, by the grace of God King of Poland, Sueden, Gothia, Vandalia, great Duke of Lituania, and of many other Prouinces Prince and Lord: To your moſt renouned Maieſtie, moſt mightie Emperour of Aſia and Europe, and King of many Kingdomes and Prouinces, euer moſt happie, wiſheth health; and by me his great Embaſſadour ſalutes you with all conuenient reuerence and

HIs high Maieſtie of Poland, conſidering the depth and height of the decrees of the great God, mernailing with all the world, and praiſing his high name; doth comfort and ioy himſelf, being more than certaine, that, that eternall power which hath preſerued your Maieſtie from all euill deſtinies of men, and from the bowels of the earth, and hath placed you in this ſhining Throne, hath not done it but for the publique good: and like a wiſe Gardiner, who hath weeded out all venomous and noyſome plants, that he hath placed your Maieſtie in their roome, as a noble and ſweet ſmelling flower, full of vertue, clemencie, and peace, deſired of all the world. His Maieſtie my Lord and Soue-
D raigne hath alwayes wiſhed, that not onely the actions of later yeares, but of many ages paſt, might haue been forgotten; and that that friendſhip and peace begun with the renowned Ottoman Kings two hundred and more yeares ſince, might haue beene without interruption continued. But ſeeing that the great God hath been pleaſed to chaſtiſe the people of both parts, by the meanes of wicked [illegible] that muſt be accepted for good which commeth from his diuine will: and therefore blotting out of mind whatſoeuer is paſt, doth now return to deſire the continuance of the firſt antient Peace, and doth offer himſelfe to your high Maieſtie to keepe it inuiolable, as it was maintained in the time of Sultan
E Amurath of happie memorie. In witneſſe of which his ſinceritie, he hath not [illegible] the offer tunitie of the breach begun by the Perſian, the expiration of the truce with the Emperour manie, nor the many reuolts and troubles in Aſia, nor hearkened to the inſtigations of many Chriſtian Princes, his friends and Allies, nor to the Tartar diſcontented; but rather hauing [illegible] wayes, hath with the bloud of his owne ſubiects, and the charge of his treaſure, bell Valachia, Moldauia, and a part of Tranſyluania, and rendered those Prouinces your Maieſties father, and ſuffered no man at any time to diſturbe or [illegible] pire; giuing intelligence like a good friend and a neighbour to your [illegible] deſignes and machinations, and in as much as was poſſible endeauoured [illegible] friendſhip; which he offereth to your moſt ſerene Maieſtie, [illegible] ons treated at Chotyn, and thoſe of your moſt happie father [illegible] they may be confirmed and maintained. And not [illegible]
F tars, as he will do the Coſſackes; and that you will ſuffer [illegible] eth your Maieſtie to do what iuſtice you thinke meet upon [illegible] the agreements and publique faith, haue made ſpoyle and [illegible] parture from thence; and with many deceits and falſe [illegible] ginnings of accommodation. And ſeeing that by the [illegible] like Sultan Soly man, and his ſucceſſors, the father [illegible]

dauia, the Baſſaes of Siliſtria, and the Beghes of Ackirman ought to keepe the paſſages of the Riuers to reſtraine the Tartars; and that thoſe now in poſſeſſion of thoſe Gouernments are alreadie knowne, and growne old in their rapine and ſpoile, the King my Lord deſireth your renowned Maieſtie, that they may be diſmiſſed, and their Prouinces giuen to ſome others more enclined to peace. For Canteмir, it is a true rule obſerued, That one Tartar can hardly gouerne another, where both liue vpon ſpoyle: and how eaſily vpon any occaſion new troubles are apprehended by thoſe who are antient enemies, I leaue to your Highneſſe wiſedome; in which his Maieſtie is ſo aſſured, that he doubteth not, that for the publique good, and for the complaints, and teares of both ſubiects, you will alſo vouchſafe to accept the requeſt of your friend, and a King your neighbour. And if all the world, and the people thereof reioyce, and praiſe God of the friendſhip and peace betweene your Maieſtie and the King my Maſter begun and concluded he hopeth that the poore and miſerable priſoner [illegible] o articipate of your clemency, that they may ioyne in the generall care to pray to the eternall God for [illegible] ncreaſe of your greatneſſe. The King my Maſter doth therefore deſire your Maieſtie to grant liberty to thoſe who are in your captiuitie, as he bindeth himſelfe to ſet free all ſuch of your Maieſties ſubiects, as are now his priſoners; and I doe promiſe on the behalfe of my Maſter, that he ſhall bee a friend to your friends, and an enemie to your enemies. In concluſion, he deſireth all happineſſe and proſperitie to your Maieſtie from a cleere heart; in ſigne and teſtimonie whereof, and of the friendſhip begun on his part, hee honoureth you with a Preſent, which you may be pleaſed to receiue with your accuſtomed benignitie; and ſhutting your eares to ſuch enformers, enemies of peace, as are found at your Part, that you will eſteeme him for a friend, and neighbour of the moſt royall and a[illegible]t kings of your moſt princely Family.

The ſouldiers continued ſtill in their mutinous diſpoſition, euen in Conſtantinople the head citie of the Turkiſh Empire, and grew to that height of inſolencie, that going in troupes to the Court, they demanded all offices of gaine; to be Stewards to the reuenues of the Churches, which are great; to take the Farmes of cuſtomes; and there committed many other outrages which were vnſufferable. The Viſiers durſt denie them nothing; they drunke wine in the ſtreets without prohibition, contrarie to their law; and ſtood in companies in the open day exacting money of all Chriſtians to pay for their wine; and being denied it, ſtabbed and murthered without any puniſhment: and when complaint was made to the Vizier or Magiſtrat they anſwered, None durſt meddle with them, who had murthered their owne King; and the Baſſaes themſelues deſired the Complainants patience, and that they would beare a part with the generall ſufferance.

About the ſame time, the Ianizaries in the gallies which rid before Smirna, commanded by the captaine Halil Baſſa, aſſaulted againſt his will the houſes of all the Chriſtian Conſuls there. The Engliſh with all thoſe of the Nation, were forced to runne naked from their lodgings, and to ſwimme to the Admirals galley to ſaue their liues: they ranſacked the lower parts of the houſe, and carried away to the value of two thouſand dollers; the French ſuſtained more loſſe; and the Venetians at leaſt ten thouſand, and one of the ſubiects of that State cut in pieces. The Generall had much adoe to appeaſe them by threats or perſuaſions, or to ſaue the liues of all; inſomuch as they miſcalled and threatened him, becauſe he would not conſent to their madneſſe. In concluſion, he was faine preſently to put to ſea, or elſe they had finiſhed the Trade at that place.

In Aſia there was then three open rebellions; one at Babylon, another at Arzerum vpon the borders of Perſia neere Tauris, and the third in Meſopotamia. The Viziers at the Port diſſembled all this, and durſt take no knowledge thereof, nor ſo much as to ſend a command thither, for feare of blowing the fire which would haue put all into combuſtion: whereupon they held a ſecret counſell and conſented to remooue themſelues, to proue if they could recouer the deſperate eſtate of that Empire, and tooke reſolution to make Halil Baſſa (the beſt ſouldier and moſt beloued) great Vizier; and in his roome Daout Baſſa captaine of the Sea; and the preſent Vizier, Chimachna or Lieutenant at the Port; and in the Spring following, they reſolued to ſend the Vizier into Aſia, with all the force they could make: to which end they ſent into Greece to warne all the ſouldierie to bee re[illegible] at Adrianople, not daring to make a rendeſuous at the Por[illegible], for feare of new trouble; and ſo to paſſe the Helleſpont, wide of the city, to appeaſe (if they could) thoſe reuolts, and by that way to draw the mutinies from the

the Court into action, and to reduce them vnto obedience. And notwithſtanding that there was no other ſymptome or prediction but ſuch as threatened the ruine of that Empire, yet were they neuer prouder nor more ſeeming not to diſtruſt themſelues, their onely ſecuritie being, That they had no enemie but themſelues.

The Grand Seignors treaſure exhauſted.

The treaſurie was farre exhauſted, the reuenue abated by the oppreſſion of euery Baſſa in his gouernment: the ſouldier increaſed both in pay and number, and ſo impatient of delay, that at euerie quarter (beſides borrowing and taking vp of the farmes of the cuſtomes beforehand) there were ſo many intollerable exactions to raiſe monies, that the apparance of domeſticke quiet could not long endure between two extreames; for means could not be found, and the Ianizaries would not be retrenched nor deferred; and this was their generall eſtate at that time.

An Embaſſador from the great duke of Muſcouie arriued at the Port.

While the Poliſh Embaſſadour was treating the peace at the Port, whereof there was no great doubt, becauſe neither ſide was fit for warre, there arriued an Embaſſadour from the great Duke of Muſcouia, which gaue ſome interruption therein, preſſing the Grand Seignior to continue the warre for ſeuen yeares againſt Poland, according to the promiſe of Sultan Oſman; offering that his Maſter ſhould enter into Poland with an armie, and that they would diuide the country between them: but his propoſition was rejected, becauſe they had had ſufficient triall of his Maſters cunning proceedings in the laſt war. For the Muſcouite hauing made peace with Poland (before the inuaſion of Oſman) for foureteene yeares, and being inuited by him to breake it and to inuade that countrey, vpon promiſe that he would continue the warre for ſeuen yeares, and make no agreement without their comprehenſion: firſt anſwered, That he could not breake the peace; thinking that the other was but a flaſh of a yong Prince: but ſo ſoone as he ſaw the Turks in the field and borders of Poland, then he began to hope he might make aduantage; and therefore promiſed Sultan Oſman on the conditions mentioned, to enter into the quarrell. And to that end diſpeeded an Embaſſadour to Poland with inſtructions to demand three things. Firſt, that the Prince of Poland ſhould renounce the title of Elect Duke of Muſcouia. The ſecond, That the Poles ſhould reſtore a territorie in the border of Lituania, taken in the late warres. Laſtly, that the peace ſhould be perpetuall; threatening that if they refuſed thoſe conditions, he would enter into the countrey with an armie, and get what he could. This Embaſſadour being arriued in the confines, heard newes that the Poles had repulſed the Turke at Chotyn, that he was retyred, and a peace treated: whereupon he feigned himſelfe ſicke, and ſent backe a Poſt with this aduice and his old inſtructions, deſiring in this alteration ſome new order from home. The Gouernour of the towne where he lay, ſuſpecting ſomewhat, intercepted the meſſenger and his packet and ſent it preſently to the King. The man returned to his Maſter the Embaſſadour, as robbed, and was againe diſpeeded the ſecond time, and ſent backe with another ſtile, to wit with letters of congratulation, joy, and offers of all helpe and continuance of the Peace: with theſe the Embaſſadour went forward to the Court; and hauing audience, the King anſwered him, That if his meſſage were ſincere, it had been very acceptable; but he knew it to be a fugred treaſon, and no faith intended from the Muſcouite, and therefore commanded him to depart.

The Embaſſadour proteſted, vowed, and vſed all means to aſſure the integritie of his meſſage; vntill he was confronted by the Chancellour, with his owne letter and his Maſters inſtructions. Hereupon was this other diſpatched to the Port to hinder the peace, and ſo offer all their helpe to continue an inuaſion. In the meane time the Muſcouite neglected no means to ſecure himſelfe, and by renewing two Embaſſadours, obtained a peace with [illegible], not knowing what effect the negotiations of the Duke of Sbarasky might produce at [illegible]. And now the Muſcouite was forced to diſſemble againe with the Turke, and make [illegible] preparation[illegible] depart.

The great Vizier Georgi enuying the authoritie of D[illegible] and the beloued ſonne of the Queene mother and brother in law to the Emperor Muſ[illegible] (who had formerly been deposed) who had beene both the inſtrument and the counſellour to murther Sultan Oſ[illegible] ſcorning that he ſhould vnderhand gouerne in his raigne, [illegible] in oppoſition the Duke of Sbaraskies buſineſſe, he there[illegible] but not daring to doe it by his owne authoritie, and in [illegible]

ſtirred vp the Spahies to demand iuſtice of him for the death of the laſt King. This looked further than the firſt aſſent; for the ſubtill Vizier, who was faithfull to his true Lord, and knowing the rage of an vnguided multitude, aimed at a by-reuenge vpon others, whom hee hoped would be inuolued and accuſed of the Order: and the ſouldier ſoone raiſed and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded him. Daout fled; but now that the buſineſſe was on foot, if he were not found the Vizier himſelfe was in danger: but the poore man was taken and brought to the Diuan, and there being called to publique iuſtice, he muſt excuſe himſelfe vpon ſome greater perſon: wherein the Emperour and his mother ranne a new hazard, which was the ſecret end. Therefore both of them forſooke him and left him to the law; and without any triall he was brought before the ſouldiers, ſtripped, his tutbant taken off, and on his knees readie to receiue the ſtroke of death: But ſuddenly the Ianizaries came to his reſcue, and carried him away to their chambers. The Spahies who began this action, tooke it in ill part, and followed with great outcries, That they would haue him die; the others demanded that he might be heard in publique Iuſtice. Thus thoſe two mutined Factions were readie to come to blowes. Daout Baſſa now in ſome hope of life, bribed the Ianizaries, and that day diſtributed fourty thouſand chequines of gold, & they promiſed to protect him. Who did not now thinke but he was taken away for ſafetie? But the Spahies followed their firſt reſolution, and to appeaſe the feare of that diſſenſion, it was agreed he ſhould die. They that meant to ſaue him, could not, but preſerued him for a greater example of iuſtice. They would not now let him loſe his head in the Court, for that death was too honourable for him that had murthered his Prince. Then the Ianizaries put him ſecretly into the ſame Coach wherein he had ſent Sultan Oſman to execution: twice in the way being drie with ſorrow, he dranke at the ſame fountaines where his late Maſter begged drinke, and ſo was conueyed into the ſame chamber where he had murthered him. The Executioners beginning to tie him, himſelfe ſhewed the verie corner where he had committed that foule fact, and deſired that there hee might (if poſſible) expiate it: and ſo he was at laſt miſerably ſtrangled. Thus he had his reward, and God was iuſt alſo euen for the wicked.

About the twentieth of Februarie, the peace (after many rubbes) betweene the grand Seigniour and the King of Poland, by the mediation of the Engliſh Embaſſadour (who was choſen by the Grand Seignior as Arbitrer of all differences) after many meetings with Diac Mahomet Baſſa Commiſſioner for the Treaty, was concluded; the Duke hauing firſt been forced to ſend this following Remonſtrance for his expedition, which much moued the Vizier, and quickened the concluſion.

The Duke of Sbarasky his Remonſtrance to the great Vizier.

YOur Excellencie may be pleaſed to remember the happy and honourable Treaty made before Chotyn: In which a peace was concluded betweene the Ottoman Empire and the kingdome of Poland, ſigned by Commiſſioners on both parts: wherein (with reference to other antient Treaties) it was agreed, That a great Embaſſadour ſhould come to the Imperiall Port, as well to confirme and ſweare the Peace, as to ſet in order ſome other incident circumſtances, as then not fully taken into conſideration. Since which, the King and Republique of Poland hauing elected me for that imployment, his Maieſtie and my ſelfe haue receiued many Letters from Delauir, Daout, Huzein, and Muſtapha, Baſſa's, all great Viziers; not only promiſing a ſpeedy end & diſpatch of the concluſion of peace, which on both parts is ſo much deſired, but alſo the releaſe of our Captiues, and all other reſpects of loue and friendſhip, according to the antient honour of the Imperiall Port: deſiring me vpon that aſſurance to proceed with alacrity and expedition. And further, it hauing pleaſed his Maieſtie of great Britaine (a friend to both) to mediate in this pious office, by his Embaſſadour Reſident, and ſent to that end, who hath giuen me by his Letters great encouragement and hopes of a reall and true proceeding in this buſineſſe, agreeable to diuers promiſes made vnto him, which he accordingly hath enformed his owne Maſter; I was very glad of this honourable function, and hoped to haue found as ready performance as is by his Maieſtie and all the world expected.

To this end I am come to the Port, with full power and inſtructions from his Maieſtie and the Republique of Poland, to conclude and finiſh a full and perpetuall Peace, with all ſinceritie and heartineſſe, neſſe, and in his Maieſties name to ſweare the ſame; offering to be friend to the friends, and enemie to the enemies of this Imperiall Port reciprocally, and to be readie to treat and accommodate all or any other circumſtances incident to a buſineſſe of ſo great conſequence.

Since my arriuall, notwithſtanding that I haue produced both the mentioned treaty at Chotyn and letters, how little I haue aduanced in the main affaires, and the doubtfull conſequences of a long protraction. I deſire you to conſider, hauing as yet proceeded no further in ſubſtance, than the deliuerie of my letters and Preſents; and to that end that there may neuer be imputed to the King and Republique of Poland any ſlackneſſe in preſent, or any breach in future, out of a ſincere and good deſire to eſtabliſh this treatie ſure and firme, and to open a cleere and true heart, I am enforced to make this true declaration: and deſire your Excellencie to weigh maturely the motiues following.

I doe not repine at mine own ſtay at this Imperiall port, where I receiue all honour; I do not doubt of the ſincere and faithfull meaning of the Emperour to conclude the peace; but the deferring hereof may, againſt our wills, breed three inconueniences.

Firſt, your Excellencie doth know, that the Coſſackes are a people not eaſily to be reſtrained, if they be once at libertie, and that they liue vpon their armes. They haue readie eight hundred boats to make an inuaſion into the Blacke Sea. In the Winter they cannot arme; they attend onely the aduice of the concluſion of peace: therefore now is the ſeaſon to finiſh and publiſh it; for if by long delaies it ſhall be deferred vnto the Spring, and that iealouſie or their owne deſire ſet them free, your Excellencie doth know in wiſedome how difficult it is, to reduce into order a people of that condition, which for our parts we are now able and readie to preuent; the State hauing ordained to ſatisfie them, and to buy their boats vpon the firſt intimation of a conclusion.

Secondly, it is the order of our nation euerie Spring to call a Parliament for the reglement of all publique affaires; of which aſſemblie I am a member: if I ſhall be ſtaied heere, and not able to render a reaſon thereof, it will breed great ſuſpition and diſturbance in the generall reſolution; you may conſider that in all parts, there are ſome miſaduiſed men, friends of ſedition and warre, and many that make aduantage of others troubles, who may doe ill offices, ſuch as the innocent may bee ſorrie for but cannot helpe.

Thirdly, the eyes of all Princes are ſet vpon the honour and faith kept on both parts, in this treaty, and accordingly will gouerne their owne occaſions.

For theſe reaſons I doe in his Maieſties name deſire your excellencie to giue me a diſpatch, ſuch as may bring ioy and content to all, by auoiding the miſeries of warre; and in ſuch time, that the ſnowes and diſcommodities of Winter ſhut me not vp; but that I may return as well to ſatisfie his maieſty and the Republique in our generall aſſembly, as to retaine thoſe, who may be cauſe of much trouble, without our conſents.

There is no difficultie that I vnderſtand; I am content to accept the antient and honourable treaties made with the famous Emperor Solyman and his ſucceſſours, and now laſtly at Chotyn: if there be any other difference, I haue power and am readie to accommodate it.

My deſire then onely is, That a preſent end and concluſion be made of a peace, firme, and perpetuall: and that the Emperour will be pleaſed according to many promiſes, to deliuer and ſet free the captiues taken in the laſt warres; as I doe in his Maieſties name giue my word that all others taken on our parts, ſhall haue libertie and paſport to returne. And if there haue been any difficultie made by occaſion of my preſſure for the reiection of Tomſha, and Cante-Emir-Emirze, I doe make this true proſtatetion, That as it is the requeſt of his Maieſty my king in friendſhip, ſo there is no other end nor cauſe of that deſire, but only to remoue all occaſion of offence and breach with this Imperial Port, which thoſe ill neighbors are euer readie to miniſter: But if that be any great inconuenience to this Imperiall Port, I only then ſeeke, that better order may be taken with them for the future, that they may liue quietly without offence of the publique peace.

I deſire your Excellencie to weigh and conſider theſe my reaſons and proteſtations, which proceed onely from a good and ſincere heart, to promoue and maintaine an inuiolable and good friendſhip with this Imperiall Port.

Within two daies after, the Duke of Sbaraskie tooke his leaue of the Emperour, to the great ioy of himſelfe and his traine, who thereby ſaw themſelues deliuered out of captiuitie. The three great and noble priſoners were ſet free, and did make a publique acknowledgement of his Majeſtie of great Britaines fauour, to whom both the Embaſſadour and they attributed the beſt part of their good ſucceſſe, and gaue particular thanks by Letter. G

Articles contracted betweene the Grand Seigniour and the King of Poland.

His Maieſtie of Poland hauing ſent into our happy Port his well deſeruing and famous great Embaſſadour the moſt illuſtrious Duke of Sbarasky, to offer vs ſincere peace, loyall friendſhip, and good correſpondence, and to ſeeke that the antient Peace and friendſhip ſhould be of vs anew confirmed, and the old Capitulations renewed, and that for the H time to come that there might be eſtabliſhed an eternall peace and friendſhip: His kingly inſtance hath beene moſt pleaſing to vs, and the peace and friendſhip of vs accepted: and we haue ordained, That all the antient treaties ſhall be renewed, and at the preſent haue giuen this our Capitulation with the following Articles.

I. FIrſt, That neuer vpon our part, nor of any of our Viziers, Beglerbeghs, Beghs, Cadees, Officers, nor Souldiors, any harme ſhall be done to the Prouinces, Cities, Caſtles, townes, villages, and other places pertaining to the King and State of Poland. And likewiſe vp- I on the part of his Maieſtie of Poland, that by his Princes, Miniſters, or Coſſacke, nor any other his ſubiects, there ſhall be no wrong done in any part of our empire, city, caſtle, towne, or village, but that both parties ſhall alwayes remaine friends to friends, and enemies to enemies.

II. And ſeeing that the Tartars of Dobrirza, Biaolograd, Keil, Ozu, and Siliſtra, and the people of Moldauia, do enter, inuade, and damnifie the State of Poland: We command, that for the time to come, our Beglerbeghs of Siliſtra, and all other Beglerbeghs of Bender, ſhall take care to keepe all thoſe paſſages and riuers, to the end that hereafter the ſaid Nations K ſhall haue no paſſage by thoſe wayes to damnifie the ſtate of Poland: and whenſoeuer it ſhall be knowne that the ſaid miniſters haue vſed negligence in keeping thoſe paſſages, according to the treatie with Sultan Solyman, of happy memorie, that ſuch miniſters be degraded and ſeuerely puniſhed.

III. The Vayuod of Moldauia likewiſe ſhall neuer grant any paſſage to the ſaid Nations: and whenſoeuer it ſhall be knowne that the ſaid Vayuod hath tranſgreſſed in this our will, hee ſhall be degraded and ſeuerely puniſhed.

IV. And whenſoeuer the ſaid Tartars and others, contrarie to this our will, ſhall make any inuaſion or ſpoyle in the ſtate of Poland, all our miniſters and gouernors ſhall apprehend L and ſeuerely puniſh them: and as it is ſet downe in the Agreements with Sultan Solyman, all the ſlaues and priſoners which ſhall by ſuch malefactors be brought into our dominions, ſhall be ſet at libertie, and their goods reſtored to them againe, and the malefactors puniſhed for hauing tranſgreſſed our Imperiall Capitulations.

V. And if any of our ſubiects ſhall buy any perſon or Poliſh goods, vniuſtly taken by ſuch malefactors, and it ſhall be made knowne vnto vs by the King of Poland; the buyers for hauing bought vnlawfull goods, their eſtate ſhall be confiſcate, and they themſelues ſeuerely puniſhed. M

VI. The Prince Chrim Tartar ſhall be obedient to vs, and all the Tartarian Nation vnder his command. Kalgha Sultan, and other Emirs and Princes of his bloud, from henceforth ſhall neuer enter into, nor inuade any part of the ſtate of Poland, nor euer do any damage,

A mage, either by the way of Moldauia, the open field or deſart, nor ſhal euer enter into or inuade any part or iuriſdiction of the ſame. And at all times that his Maieſtie of Poland ſhall notice, That the ſaid Prince or others aboue mentioned haue broken this our will and capitulations, and entered and damnified his State; for their diſobedience, the ſaid Prince giue as well as the others, ſhall be by vs puniſhed and chaſtiſed; and we command that neuer any one, in any part of our Dominion, ſhall ſel either people or goods robbed from the State of Poland; and finding that there be any one that hath dared to buy men, or goods, robbed from them, ſuch ſhall be immediately puniſhed with confiſcation. And as before mentio-
B ned, the Beglerbeghs of Siliſtria, with all diligence ſhall keepe the ſtraights of Oſue and neuer ſuffer the ſaid people to paſſe; and if it ſhall bee knowne they haue tranſgreſſed they ſhall be puniſhed with loſſe of their charge and office.

And whenſoeuer the ſaid Prince Crim Tartar, or his Kalka, Emirze, or others ſhall by VII. our order be called and commanded in their proper perſons, to goe to any part of the war in our ſeruice, if by chance they ſhould paſſe by the confines of Poland, as it is ſet downe in the capitulations of my father of happie memorie, They ſhall enter into any village, Borough, Caſtle, or Citie of Polonia, or doe any kinde of dammage to the people thereof; and finding that they haue giuen any moleſtation or hurt, they ſhall bee corrected, as is aforeſaid.

And in conformitie of my fathers ſaid capitulation, euerie time that his Maieſtie of Po- VIII.
C land ſhall inuite and call the ſaid Prince Crim Tartar in his occaſion of warre whiles hee giueth him his annuall ſtipend, the ſaid Prince with all his forces and armie, ſhall go, help, and aſſiſt his maieſtie in euery ſuch occaſion, and ſhew all friendſhip and ſinceritie: to which effect we haue giuen order, that our Imperiall letters be written to the ſaid Prince, in this particular, who ſhall obſerue all according to our will and pleaſure.

And for the better eſtabliſhing of this our peace and amitie according to the antient ca- IX.
pitulations and obſeruance, his maieſtie of Poland promiſeth to ſend his great Embaſſa-D dor to the ſaid Prince of Tartars; and (beginning from this preſent, the 24 of the moneth of Iune) to pay yearely to the ſaid Prince his accuſtomed ſtipend in this forme following. Euerie yeare his maieſtie ſhall ſend the ſaid ſtipend into the Caſtle of Chotyn in Moldauia, and the Vayuod thereof ſhall certifie the ſaid Prince Crim, who ſhall preſently ſend his Embaſſadour to receiue the ſame, by the hands of the Vayuod. The which Prince ſhall alwaies obſerue this forme, and ſhall bee alwaies obedient to this our Imperiall Will.

And in caſe that his Maieſtie of Poland ſhould faile any yeare to ſend the ſaid ſtipend, the X.
Prince Tartar ſhall not ſuddenly riſe with his armie and inuade Poland; but, according E to the agreements of Sultan Solyman, continuing ſtill in his obedience, he ſhall certifie vs, and we will procure and recouer his right.

His Maieſtie of Poland doth promiſe that from henceforward, the Coſſackes ſhall not XI.
enter nor come into any part of our empire by the riuers of Oſue or any other, nor make any ſpoile therein: and if the ſaid Coſſackes doe enter into any part of our Dominions and doe any hurt, we certifying his Maieſtie by our Imperiall letters, hee promiſeth to correct them ſeuerely, and to put to death the malefactors for breaking the capitulations, and violating the peace and amitie.

And all our ſubiects which ſhall be made ſlaues, and impriſoned by the ſaid Coſſackes, XII.
F ſhall be immediatly ſet at libertie; and the miniſters of his Maieſtie ſhall alwaies be diligent to puniſh the tranſgreſſours, and wholly reſtore thoſe perſons and goods, which they ſhall haue taken from our ſaid ſubiects, and that neuer any ſubiect of the King of Poland ſhall buy any ſtollen goods: and if any haue preſumed and bought, that he be ſeuerely puniſhed: and in generall all that which we haue promiſed concerning the Tartars and Moldauians, ſo his Maieſtie alſo doth promiſe to vs for the Coſſacks and other his ſubiects. G

XIII. After the concluſion of this Peace, if vpon the confines or open fields, fiſhers or hunters on either part meeting together, ſhall happen to fall out or be at difference by their owne occaſion, it ſhall be no diſturbance to this our peace and amitie.

XIIII. Alwayes according to the antient agreements, the princes or Vayuods of Moldauia, ſhall ſhew to his Maieſtie of Poland all due reuerence and reſpect, good amitie and neighbourhood: and ſeeing that the ſaid Vayuods haue euer been as it were inſtruments of preſeruation, or of the breach of the Peace; therefore we command, that for the time to come, neither the ſaid Vayuods, nor other of our Beglerbeghs or miniſters, ſhall build in thoſe Confines any new Caſtle, Fort, or bridge; and that in thoſe Caſtles or Forts of thoſe frontiers which are alreadie built, there ſhall neuer any other garriſons be kept but Moldauians: and according to the antient Capitulations, the Tartars ſhall not inhabit, dwell, or till within thoſe confines, of both nations. H

XV. And to the end this peace and amitie may be alwayes kept betweene vs, we ſweare by the name of God, and aſſure by this our Imperiall Article, that all the Embaſſadours, great or inferiour, which ſhall be ſent from vs to his Maieſtie, or thoſe great or leſſe which ſhall bee ſent from his Maieſtie to vs, ſhall alwaies be ſafe and ſecure, as well in their comming, as their returne; and that there ſhall neuer be need of any other paſport, but that they ſhall be of vs by all wayes honored and well receiued. I

XVI. Concerning merchants, paſſengers, and other Polacke negotiators, they ſhall alwayes come ſafely and ſecurely by ſea and land, into all the parts of our Empire; and for cuſtomes, tolles, and other duties of their merchandiſe, and in caſe of debt, credit, ſuretiſhip, and ſuch other like accidents concerning the courſe of Juſtice and Law, we command that it ſhall be alwayes obſerued according to the agreements with our father, of happy memorie, Sultan Achmat. Which Articles we at this preſent accept and confirme, ratifie, and command that they be of all our ſubiects for euer punctually obeyed and obſerued. K

XVII. Furthermore we promiſe, and in the name of God ſweare, to obſerue and maintaine for euer all thoſe couenants and Articles agreed vpon and written in our Capitulations, by our great grandfather, grandfather, and father, and neuer to diſanull any of them.

XVIII. And whereas to ſhew greater deſire of ſinceritie concerning this Peace, his Maieſtie of Poland hath ſought of vs by his ſaid great Embaſſadour, that the ſubiects of Poland may ſafely and ſecurely come by the riuer of Turla with diuers merchandiſe, and ſell, buy, and traffique in Ackirman, which traffique being vſed will be of great benefit to both Eſtates; We ordaine and command from henceforward, that the ſaid Nation may come and negotiate ſafely and ſecurely in the ſaid Ackirman. And to the end that this buſineſſe be eſtabliſhed and concluded in a good manner, we will giue order to our Embaſſadour, whom we intend to ſend ſhortly to his Maieſtie for the ratification thereof. L

XIX. Which preſent Articles, Capitulations, Peace, Amitie, League, and Correſpondence, by the grace of God we promiſe vndoubtedly to maintaine ſo long as we liue in this world: and do hereby conclude betweene vs and our poſteritie, and the Kings and State of Polonia, an euerlaſting Peace; Sealing it and confirming it with theſe words, Friends to Friends, and Enemies to Enemies. M

Notwithſtanding all this, after the Duke was departed one dayes journy, where he ſtayed to

A to receiue the treatie ſigned, they altered ſome of the articles to their own aduantage, without his knowledge. Which when he heard, he complained anew by his letters to the Port of the abuſe offered vnto him, and made haſte rather to eſcape than returne. But the Coſſackes at the ſame time being ſtirring about the Blacke ſea, the Vizier and State (hauing nothing more in care than to ſhut vp that backe port, whereby they ſuffered much loſſe and diſhonour, and could not reuenge it vpon a fugitiue people; which diuided their nauall armie, being forced to ſend a portion of gallies to defend the trade, the beſt part of reliefe of the citie of Conſtantinople comming from thoſe coaſts) reſolued to giue content to the Poles, and to aſſure the Peace; that they might with more ſecuritie attend their affaires in Aſia and Hungarie; which action was fauoured vehemently by the preſent Vizier. To which end, he ſent anſwer into Poland, with promiſes of faith, and reparation for the iniuries committed by the Tartars; laying the fault of miſwriting the treatie vpon the Chancellour, which though they amended not, yet they did explain and interpret: and for better eſtabliſhment and ſecuritie on their behalfes of the peace, they reſolued to depoſe Iehan-Begh Prince of Tartaria, and ſent Mechmet Gheray his couſin german and firſt of the bloud, late priſoner in the Rhodes, to take poſſeſſion of his dominion; who vndertooke to quiet and reſtraine that people: which he cauſed to be ſignified to Poland, that the King might ſee, theſe alterations were onely for the full ſecuritie of the peace on their ſide, that the Pole might take the like courſe with the Coſſackes, who were not as yet reclaimed. Some of the capitulations of peace altered by the Turks.

1623. The ſouldiers continued ſtill in their height of furie and madneſſe, and thoſe that were to C goe vpon the gallies for the defence of the blacke ſea, and other deſignes, being ready to depart, robbed, ſlew, brake houſes in the face of the Magiſtrate in the open day: What was it not lawfull for them to doe, that had ſlaine their King, and made and deſtroied the great Miniſters at their will and pleaſure, as their Stewards and ſeruants? and God did ſo blinde them, that they ſhould not ſee, that they digged vp their owne roots, and were made by God the blind inſtruments of their owne ruine. The mint alſo was remoued into the Seraglio, where was brought forth all the ſaddles, bridles, ſtirrops, that had any gold or ſiluer vpon them, with all old plate, to make money to patch vp a quiet, and to ſatisfie and content the ſouldiers, and all little enough for the preſent, to ſaue the citie from a totall ſacke. 1623. The ſouldiers ſtill continue in their furie.

The Embaſſadours of the Prince of Tranſyluania, hauing changed their ſtile of excuſing a D firme peace with the Emperour by the change of the Vizier, and finding the opportunitie of a friend now in place to aid their Prince, they negotiated new matter, aſſuring the Port, that by the troubles of Germanie, a faire occaſion was giuen to recouer Hungarie, and to ſet the Crowne vpon their Maſters head; and that therefore if the Grand Seignior would be pleaſed to grant vnto their Prince the aid of the Græcian armie, that he would make another attempt to weaken the greateſt enemie of that Empire; which they eaſily obtaining (the ignorance and auarice of the Turke opening a way to credulitie which was the conſtant aduantage of Gabor, who could concord both their vnderſtandings and forces to his own ends) being in all fully ſatisfyed, they departed the twentieth of Aprill. Which reſolution of the Port was much wondred at by all wiſe men, who knew how vnfit the Turke was at that preſent for E a warre. The Prince was then at Caſſouia, expecting the iſſue of his Embaſſage, and in hope of Turkiſh aid; which being granted and gathered vpon his frontier, and ioyned at laſt with his owne forces, his whole armie was not very great, nor had he any cannon to march withall to beſiege any place: his chiefeſt truſt conſiſting in his intelligence in Hungarie, where hee expected a generall reuolt, and that all the garriſons would open to him, or at leaſt ſome diuerſitie in Sileſia (which he was promiſed) facilitate his wars; and he was not in deſpaire, that vpon the firſt appearance of an armie, Morauia, by the fauour of the Countie of Tourne and his friends, would follow the ſame example; and this was the deſigne which his Embaſſadors had ſo long ſolicited at the Port, and diſſembled at their firſt comming. Now there was nothing expected but a warre: but not long after, there arriued a new Embaſſadour from the F Prince, without any mention of the affaires of thoſe parts; which made all men inquiſitiue, thinking hee was either come to haſten the ſuccours, or to change ſomething in the manner and other circumſtances depending thereon: but it was found that the States of Tranſyluania had aſſembled at Alba-Iulia, and were verie loath to entertaine a warre, or to breake with the Emperour; and therefore diſpeeded two Commiſſioners towards him, who were well receiued The Embaſſadours of the prince of Tranſyluania departed from the Port.

receiued and treated at Vienna: and from the Emperour was ſent to Tranſyluania the Biſhop G of Nitria. Whereupon a new peace was treated, and this Embaſſadour ſent to procure the recall of the former commands, giuen to the Baſſaes to moue with their armies. Whereby it was ſuſpected he neuer had any purpoſe to make a warre, but onely to ballance by the continuance thereof his feares and laſt agreements with the Emperour.

The Baſſa of Arzirum in rebellion.

All men propheciedd (by reaſon of daily diſorders) the fall of the Ottoman Empire. But now the Baſſa of Arzirum who was ioyned with diuers others, and had made a great armie, was in his march towards Angria, the direct way to Conſtantinople (Babylon yet reſting in rebellion) with a pretence of reformation; who tooke nothing by force, but the treaſure of the Empire. He held a generall Counſell in his campe, and ſent to the Port to require the preſence of the Mufti, Cadees, Baſſaes, and antient Beghs, to take knowledge and to pu[illegible]he traitors H that murthered the late King, and to ſettle a new one lawfully, that ſhould be a[illegible] to gouerne; to reduce the mutined citie-ſouldier to obedience and diſcipline, and to place about the Em-perour ſome great Vizier, choſen by the State, able to direct and apply remedies to the diſea-ſes then growne to a Chryſis: complaining, that euery three or foure moneths, by the change of the Vizier, the prouinces were deſtroyed (for they placed and diſplaced the gouernors according to their own factions) and ſo contrarie orders were ſent abroad dayly, inſomuch as no man knew who was King or Vizier, nor whom they ſhould obey. Theſe were his pretences, and if the preſent State would not conſent to this aſſembly, he then reſolued to come to the Port, and ſettle all things at his pleaſure by the ſword. The g[illegible] Officers in poſſeſſion of the Emperor and gouernment, loath to be called to an account b[illegible] the ſouldier, tooke a worſe re- I ſolution, To make a war; and made choice of Cigala Baſſa fo[illegible] General: which he refuſed vp-on the ſame pretence, that in his abſence alterations would be ſo frequent; and that he ſhould not pleaſe, or at leaſt vncertainly, and according to interpretation. Therefore he would haue an abſolute Dictatorſhip for the time, equall to that of a great Vizier, or elſe he would not ſtir.
This was granted him, and mony giuen out, and order to paſſe the water ſpeedily; enrolling for his armie fifteene thouſand Ianizaries and thirty thouſand Spahies. But thoſe did demur, and alledged it was a war againſt their owne brethren, and ſought any excuſes rather than to come to blowes. But the ſecret was, it was then Ramazan, or their holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receiue their pay; and therefore they would not moue, but pretended religion. Next day after their feaſt, when they ſhould march, they ſhewed themſelues careleſſe K (hauing firſt held many conſultations) and would not march at all, vnleſſe the Emperour or great Vizier would go in perſon. So euery day brought forth new ſubiect of trouble, and the Empire to a great deale of hazard and danger.

MORAT

Morat in tender age the Throne aſcends, for wanton luſt more apt, than princely ends: Sporting he lies in a luxurious bed, whileſt Bagdat is by Perſia conquered;
A greater loſſe than this, who can deuine vnleſſe to loſe the ſeat of Conſtantine.
His other Acts, and how he ſtill proceeds ſhall here enſue in ſtorie of his deeds.

MORAT,

THE RAIGNE OF MORAT, OR AMVRATH, THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, ELEVENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES; HE THAT NOW SVAYETH THAT MIGHTIE MONARCHIE.

NAWAB SALAR JUNG BAHADUR.

C Vpon the laſt day of Auguſt, Sultan Muſtapha, brother of Achmat, who had beene twice Emperour, was depoſed; and Sultan Morat, ſonne to Achmat, and brother to Oſman murthered, the yere before placed in the Throne. But it will not be vntimely nor vnprofitable, to diſcourſe of the cauſes and reaſons of thoſe great mutations, which are the intrinſique part and ſoule of Action. Sultan Muſtapha depoſed, & Sultan Morat placed in his Throne.

That State for fifteene moneths after the death of Oſman, was a ſtage of varietie, the Souldierie vſurping all gouernment, placing and diſplacing as the winde of fauour or diſfauour moued them. In that time there were three Emperours, ſeuen great Viziers, two Captaine Baſſa's, fiue Aga's of the Ianizaries, three Treaſurers, ſix Baſſa's of Cairo, and in proD portion as many changes of Gouernors in all the Prouinces; euery new Vizier making vſe of his time, diſplacing thoſe in poſſeſſion, and ſelling their fauour to others: ſo as the whole empire was in a manner fined foure or fiue times; ſuch was the eating and welcome of euery Baſſa to their gouernment. Huzein Baſſa the laſt Vizier of them (a tyrant hated of all men) conſumed the publique treaſure to faſt, and exacted money from priuat men ſo violently, to maintaine his faction with the Ianizaries, that euen the Receiuers were afraid, and weary, and the wiſeſt of them foreſaw their owne ruine in the generall conſumption: when there was any murmure againſt him, he preſently ſilenced it either by gifts or bloud. As ſoone as hee had diſpatched away the Generall Gigala Baſſa with the armie for the ſuppreſſion of the great rebellion in Aſia (which vpon the depoſition of Georgi, and the making of him Vizier, was E content to march: which he did rather to disburthen himſelfe of feares, by ſending out of the way the Spahies, who were his oppoſites, than for any loue to the State: which Armie, what inſolencies they committed for thirtie dayes before their paſſing the water, euen in the face of Iuſtice, was as incredible as impoſſible to relate) he ſent priuatly to ſtrangle Halil Baſſa, Georgi, and Muſtapha, late Viziers; hoping thereby he had remoued all concurrents. Whether this gaue the occaſion, or that his ſinne was ripe for reuenge, the Spahies ſuddenly gathered head, and the old Wolfe fled to his truſtie gard the Ianizaries. The citie was almoſt diuided; but the Spahies ſent their reſolution plainly, being the weaker in number, That they deſired not to come to blowes with their Brethren; but if the Ianizaries would protect him, that they ſhould keep him, Conſtantinople, & Greece: but they themſelues would depart and F diſpoſe of Aſia. Which was a bold profeſſion, but eaſie, the forces of the Rebels being of their ſocietie. The wiſeſt foreſaw the peril, and they all agreed to change him; and ſo the Seale was giuen to Aly Baſſa, a man reputed honeſt, but melancholie and vntried for ſo great a charge. Euery one ſaw thoſe outward wheeles of motion, but the ſpring within that moued them was not ſo ſoon diſcouered. The armie mentioned for Aſia, arriuing at Nicomedia, fiue dayes

A Councell did still connive with the actions of that Bassa.

Bechir-Subbaſi, who had reuolted in Babylon, and held that castle against the Emperour all the last Summer, hauing beene streightly besieged by Hasis Achmat Bassa, and in danger to be forced, sent his sonne to Sha-Abas the King of Persia, for succours: whereupon hee obtained some Persian horse; vpon the discouerie of which, the Bassa, fearing he should be compelled to raise his siege, betooke himselfe to dissimulation, as if he had such authoritie from the Grand Seignior; he made a composition, and not onely pardoned Bechir, and all offences past, but conferred the gouernment of that citie and prouince vpon him as Bassa, and so retyred his Armie. Yet although Bechir-Subbaſi was content to free himselfe from the present necessity by treaty, yet really he held the place of the Persian, and to his vse; whose Agent at

B the Port demanded both that and Ahiska, as the antient patrimonie of his Ancestors.

Bechir-Subbaſi sends his sonne to Sha-Abbas the King of Persia for succours.

Bethlem Gabor hauing with great expedition marched ouer Hungarie, and reduced most part thereof to his obedience, except the townes of Presburgh, Rab, Romasa, and some few other forts, his armie consisting of thirty three thousand Transyluanians and Hungarians, and almost as many Turks and Tartars voluntarily following for bootie; met with no shew of resistance vntill he approched Tyrnauia, within foure dayes march of the borders of Austria: whither sending before some regiments of his horse, to the number of foure thousand, to summon the towne, they discouered some Imperiall troupes sent to make garrison therein, being two thousand three hundred foot, and two hundred horse, and arriued within halfe an English mile; betweene whom and the citie they thrust themselues. These troupes perceiuing they

C were suddenly preuented, and not knowing how farre the Princes whole armie was behinde, tooke downe a small brooke to a village, and fortified themselues in a Church and Church-yard walled. The Commander of the Hungars dispatched away a Currier to Bethlem Gabor, with aduise that he should send him some foot with expedition, relating the manner how hee had enclosed this garrison. In the meane time he summoned the Imperialists, and told them that he had taken possession of Tyrnauia for his Master; and at the same time summoned the towne, and told them, That their succors sent had yeelded vnto him, keeping all intelligence from one another, and both from attempting any thing. The next day, the Prince with his Vantguard arriued in sight, and then this Colonell sent some troupes to make guard before one of the Ports very neere the wall. Those Germanes shut vp in the Church-yard, seeing

D the enemies horse vnder the command of the towne, and no shot made at them, beleeued that it was true that the place was rendered: so before the foot came vp to force them, they yeelded themselues, and tooke pay of the Prince, all except six and thirty of the principall that had licence to depart. Those being then woon, the citizens the next day opened their gates, and receiued Bethlem Gabor for their Lord, and thus these were gained without any stroke. From thence he marched directly towards Morauia, and sent before him a daies iourney eight thousand horse to discouer and spoile. The Emperour finding these beginnings vrgent, ordered the brother of the Prince of Licheſtein to draw downe his garrisons from Bohemia and Morauia to the frontire, and sent the Marquesse of Montenegro, with Colalto, Don Baltheſar de Marades, the Count Sticke-Walſtein, Tiffenbacke, Count Torquato kinsman to the Pope, Sampach,

E and all his principall Captaines to meet them, and to forme an armie for defence. There was gathered together fifteene thousand besides the baggage; who being lodged at the foot of an hill in the borders of Morauia, and many of their souldiers straggling to gather grapes, were by the auantcurriers of Bethlem Gabor discouered, and presently beset, who tooke and slew seuen hundred. Some escaped and gaue the alarme, or else the whole Imperiall campe had beene surprised without sentinell or guard, they hauing proued as seruiceable as the geese in the Capitoll. The Hungars hauing gotten the top of the hill, and seeing the Bohemian and German armie so neere in the bottome, and in some confusion, resolued to make triall how they were prouided, and made shew of a charge; but finding them in better order to receiue them, they retired; one captaine onely aduenturing too neere, was taken prisoner and carried to the Im-

F periall quarter; who being examined, told them, That the Prince with a mightie army, would the next night be in sight, and therefore he aduised them to prepare for their safetie; for that he came with resolution to fight, and ouermatching them with number, there was no possibilitie of other than death or captiultie. The Imperials rather scorned, than beleeued these threatnings: but the captaine assuring them it was no time to jest with his own life and theirs, they

For though it were a hard choice for him to be bitten by a Wolfe, or by a dogge (which were his owne words) yet seeing he could better trust the one, than the other, he would make vse of one to curbe the other. This gaue not full satisfaction; but the words of a Prince must
C be currant payment, because they beare his stampe; for his meaning, or what he treated, ...trusted none withall but his owne breast. The messenger hee sent vnto the Port, played his part so well and secretly, as he gaue satisfaction to that State, readie enough to beleeue well, and procured a ratification of the truce supposed then to be made; and for instructions in the intended treatie, he propounded, in his Masters name, three articles, and one commission. Firſt, That the Emperor should disclaim all right and title to Hungarie, and should leaue the people free, and the Prince of Transyluania to gouerne them. Secondly, That the Princes, and all the Prouinces that had sent their embassadors and Presents to the Port, and had made league with him, and had taken the Imperiall protection, should bee restored to their pristine libertie and D states. Thirdly, That the Emperour should pay a tribute of fortie thousand dollars for Austria, pretended to be granted in the daies of Sultan Solyman. But the Commission was the key of the worke, whereby the Prince, with the counsell of the Bassa of Buda, obtained full power at his owne discretion, if he found peace conuenient, to make and conclude it; this last being, (as was supposed) the end and scope of Bethlem Gabors desires; the other propositions onely a garnishing, to make the Turkes beleeue that he was carefull of their seruice; and the Emperour, that he was verie powerfull, and much esteemed at the Port. Which all men imagined would produce an end of those wars: For the Prince of Transyluania confessed, that he drew not in the Turkes for any need he had of their succours, nor for any benefit intended to them, but to make a glorious shew to the Emperour, of his credit with the Grand Seignior, thereby to facilitate his ends.

A truce betweene the Emperour and the Prince of Transiluania.

E After some time spent in treatie with the Commissioners of the army, a truce was taken betweene the Prince of Transyluania and the Marquesse De Monte Negro, Generall for his Imperiall Maiestie, before the town of Ghoding on the frontier of Morauia, where the Germans were besieged; and letters presently written thereof by the Prince to the great Vizier, which were dated the tenth of Nouember. The mediatour betweene them was the Palatine Stanislaus Turzow an Hungarian. The articles of greatest importance, or that were then published to the world, were foure:

The articles of the truce.

I. That on both parts Armes should be deposed for ten moneths (ending the fixth of Septem- F ber 1624) and all other acts of hostilitie giuen ouer. That there should of neither side any attempt be made, nor by force nor fraud to take any Castles, Forts, Cities, or places of defence during this time; and that both Germanes, Hungars, and Turkes, should be alike comprehended.

II. That if the Emperour were desirous to treat and conclude a finall peace with the Grand Seignior,

A Iuſtice of his Maieſtie, without offence of the Port: the great vizier ſhall Commands ſhould be required. But He knowing how weake effect thoſe had produced in other occaſions, and how little obedience and reſpect thoſe comm did beare vnto the Port (the Baſſa's themſelues connniuing, and nouriſhing thereby the gain) eſpecially conſidering, that what face ſoeuer, and ſeeming diſlike was ſhewed & pretended, yet inwardly the Turks did take pleaſure and glory, that the Chriſtian was robbed weakened and ſpoyled, vnder the ſhadow of peace; did vtterly refuſe to accept of ſuch feigned remedies, but inſiſted vpon two points, whereby only there might be ſome hope of redreſſe in that affaire:

First, That the Grand Seigniour would ſend an expreſſe Chiaus to Algier and Tunes, to B call to the Port ſome of the principall inhabitants and aduenturers, of all the Orders of thoſe cities, ſuch as ſent and armed out the ſhips of courſe; that being conuented face to face, and accuſed and conuinced of matter of the fact, the State might be truly informed of the conſe-quence of their outragious theeuerie, and prouide ſuch remedie as ſhould be requiſite and ſufficient in the future, to ſecure the commerce and free nauigation in thoſe ſeas.

Secondly, That the Baſſa's who were ſent from the Port rather for cuſtome and pretence of dominion, than for any great fruit or hope of obedience (yet becauſe they returned at the end of their gouernment, they might be reſponſible for matters concerning themſelues) might receiue ſtrict and abſolute order, not to take any tenths of the prizes, becauſe being diſintereſſed, and ſharing no profit, there might be more hope, by their authoritie, of execu-C tion of the Grand Seigniours pleaſure in reſtraint of their robberies.

These Propoſitions found at firſt much oppoſition; but the Embaſſador refuſing all other ordinarie and vneffectiue means, required either this forme of proceeding; or, that the grand Seignior would declare them out of his protection, and ſtanding neutrall leaue them to their owne defence: proteſting, That this courſe was taken for good reſpect to the Port; yet if really ſome order were not eſtabliſhed, that there was no remedie but to redreſſe theſe iniu-ries by the ſword, and to puniſh thoſe Barbarians as Inimici humani generis, publike enemies of mankind. Deſiring the Viziers to take it to ſerious conſideration, that ſeeing amitie and corre-ſpondence betweene the Kingdome of England and the Turkiſh Empire, did principally and almoſt integrally depend vpon commerce and traffique, the whole foundation was ſhaken D and made vſeleſſe to both, by the interruption of thoſe theeues. Theſe reaſons concurring with the diſtemper of thoſe times, and their owne feares, ſo farre preuailed, that by a generall conſultation it was concluded, to ſatisfie the Embaſſadour in his owne wayes: and accordingly a meſſenger was diſpatched from the Port to call to Iuſtice ſome of all the Orders, to anſwer as Deputies for the Cities, before the Vizier and Diuan, in ſuch accuſations as ſhould be obiected againſt them.

This negotiation was begun and finiſhed, as much as concerned the authoritie of the Grand Seigniour, in the yeare 1622; but being not perfected and tranſacted vntill the next, and that time full of various mutations, we haue thought fit to continue the thred of the former hiſtorie, and not to mingle and confound it with relations of ſeuerall and vnlike ſubiects E and natures: and though this part be found a little out of his owne time, yet both will be the cleerer by the diſſeueration.

The Baſſa and inhabitants of Algier hauing receiued letters by Mehemet Aga, both reprehending them for inſolencies committed vpon the Engliſh nation, and commanding them to keepe the peace of the Empire, and to bring with him ſome of the principall of that gouernment; did elect foure and twentie Commiſſioners (amongſt whom, the Mufti was both the head and aduocate) and gaue them inſtructions and order to recriminate and accuſe the Engliſh of many depredations and iniuries: hoping thereby, either to extenuate their owne offence, or by pretending iuſt cauſe, to leaue themſelues at libertie to continue their piracies. And F the Baſſa and Citie of Tunes hauing receiued by the ſaid Meſſenger reprehenſions and commands to the like effect, they reſolued in their paſſage to Conſtantinople to conſult with their fellowes of Tunes, who ioyned to them two of their Councell, and gaue them inſtru-ctions to be aſſiſtant: but with this caution, that they ſhould not declare themſelues openly, but to obſerue the proceedings of thoſe of Algier, and to conforme with them, that if they were enforced to make peace, they ſhould concurre and be comprehended; but if it were poſſible

Seigniour, he should vse Bethlem Gabor as the mediatour, and doe nothing therein with G out his priuitie.

III. That all the places and fortes, taken in by the Prince of Transyluania in his late expedition, should rest quiet in his possession vntill the time expired: And that all Cities and castles now in the possession of either, should so remaine without any alteration.

IIII. That all passages should be open for free trade, and secure entercourse of marchants, and all other the subiects and friends of either side.

This done, the Prince of Transyluania made a shew of redeeming all the poore captiues, H taken by the Turks at his own charge, with some help from the Imperials, vpon whom he laid the blame, as hauing failed to meet him vpon a passage of water, where he entertained the Turkish army: but they not comming, hee pretended the Turkes rose in the night, and carried them all away to the number of twentie thousand.

The Hungars set vpon the Turkes in their retreat.

The Prince warned the Turkes to keepe in order, and not to straggle in their retrait, nor to commit any insolencie and spoile, the countrey being all in armes and alreadie enraged: but they followed not his councell, which caused some two thousand Hungarian horse to set vpon them as they were diuided, and slew fiue or six hundred of them, and recouered some prisoners, whereupon the Turks vnited and returned, and killed as many of the Hungars, tooke one man of qualitie, and many other slaues.

The King of Persia inuades the Prouince of Babylon.

Vpon aduice from Hafis Bassa General of the Prouince of Babylon, That the King of Persia I with a powerfull armie, had entered those quarters, and that both the citie and that countrey would be lost, if aides did not arriue verie speedily; and the Rebels in Asia continuing their insolencie, a warre was suddenly proclaimed at the Port, in such termes as neuer had beene heard of in former times; to say, That whosoeuer tooke pay of the Grand Seigniour in any kinde as a souldier, if hee came not to the Rendeuous appointed with his armes, should bee confiscated, esteemed as a Rebell, and his wife and children sold for slaues. This was sent into Greece, Natolia, Trabizond, and all the vtmost confines of the Turkish Empire. Hereupon the Grand Seigniour and the wisest of the Bassaes, inclined to buy Abassa Bassa, and to send him a generall pardon and grant of all his demands, vpon condition, that he would pre- K sently march and turne his army against the common enemie; fearing either the doubtfulnesse of a battell with desperate men, or to force him to retire and joyne with the Persian, where he might be well receiued. And as the present condition of the State then stood, the councell was good; but the Ianizaries would not consent nor hearken to any reconcilement with their professed enemie; but required to be led out against Abassa Bassa first, and so to proceed in the warre: and because their owne Aga (brother in law to the Empetour) did not concurre with them in opinion, they mutined against him, who wisely gaue way to the storme, and surrendered his charge; to which a Page of the Court was presently aduanced. Thus, while it was vnresolued how to proceed against the Persian and Abassa Bassa joyntly, who continued to spoile and put to ransom all Asia the lesse, and could not be reconciled for the Ianizaries, nor safely attempted for the Spahies (between which two Orders) there was as yet bad intelligence L and emulation: the King of Persia conquered the prouince and Citie of Babylon, put to flight Hafis Achmet Bassa the Generall of that defensiue warre, and tooke prisoner Chur Hassen Bassa a renowned old Souldier, cut in pieces all that opposed him, possessed himselfe of * Mo- Niniue.
sul, and Leska on the Persian Sea, and diuiding his armie, sent part towards Van and Diarbeck, and the other towards Mecha, as if he had hope and designe to share all the Easterne part of the Turkish Empire.

Touching the affaires of Tunes and Algier.

His Maiestie the King of Great Britaine, hauing by his first letters in 1621, complained to the Grand Seigniour, and commanded his Embassadour to seeke redresse against the Piracies and insolencies of the inhabitants of Algier and Tunes, who in the two former yeares, had ta- M ken aboue a hundred ships and vessels of all sorts, and had made slaues of aboue twelue hundred of his Maiesties subiects: and had then vpon their walls, a thousand pieces of yron ordnance, besides those in their shipping, taken from the English and Dutch: The Embassadour pressing to obtain iustice against them, or that they might be abandoned and left to the

Iustice

A Iustice of his Maiestie, without offence of the Port; the great Vizier offered to giue what Commands should be required. But He knowing how weake effect those Letters of course had produced in other occasions, and how little obedience and respect those common theeues did beare vnto the Port (the Bassa's themselues conniuing, and nourishing thereby their owne gain) especially considering, that what face soeuer, and seeming dislike was shewed & pretended, yet inwardly the Turks did take pleasure and glory, that the Christian was robbed weakened and spoyled, vnder the shadow of peace; did vtterly refuse to accept of such feigned remedies, but insisted vpon two points, whereby only there might be some hope of redresse in that affaire:

First, That the Grand Seigniour would send an expresse Chiaus to Algier and Tunes, to
B call to the Port some of the principall inhabitants and aduenturers, of all the Orders of those cities, such as sent and armed out the ships of course; that being conuented face to face, and accused and conuinced of matter of the fact, the State might be truly informed of the consequence of their outragious theeuerie, and prouide such remedie as should be requisite and sufficient in the future, to secure the commerce and free nauigation in those seas.

Secondly, That the Bassa's who were sent from the Port rather for custome and pretence of dominion, than for any great fruit or hope of obedience (yet because they returned at the end of their gouernment, they might be responsible for matters concerning themselues) might receiue strict and absolute order, not to take any tenths of the prizes, because being
C disinteressed, and sharing no profit, there might be more hope, by their authoritie, of execution of the Grand Seigniours pleasure in restraint of their robberies.

These Propositions found at first much opposition; but the Embassador refusing all other ordinarie and vneffectiue means, required either this forme of proceeding; or, that the grand Seignior would declare them out of his protection, and standing neutrall leaue them to their owne defence: protesting, That this course was taken for good respect to the Port; yet if really some order were not established, that there was no remedie but to redresse these iniuries by the sword, and to punish those Barbarians as Inimici humani generis, publike enemies of mankind. Desiring the Viziers to take it to serious consideration, that seeing amitie and correspondence betweene the Kingdome of England and the Turkish Empire, did principally and
D almost integrally depend vpon commerce and traffique, the whole foundation was shaken and made vselesse to both, by the interruption of those theeues. These reasons concurring with the distemper of those times, and their owne feares, so farre preuailed, that by a generall consultation it was concluded, to satisfie the Embassadour in his owne wayes: and accordingly a messenger was dispatched from the Port to call to Iustice some of all the Orders, to answer as Deputies for the Cities, before the Vizier and Diuan, in such accusations as should be obiected against them.

This negotiation was begun and finished, as much as concerned the authoritie of the Grand Seigniour, in the yeare 1622; but being not perfected and transacted vntill the next, and that time full of various mutations, we haue thought fit to continue the thred of the for-
E mer historie, and not to mingle and confound it with relations of seuerall and vnlike subiects and natures: and though this part be found a little out of his owne time, yet both will be the cleerer by the dissueration.

The Bassa and inhabitants of Algier hauing receiued letters by Mehemet Aga, both reprehending them for insolencies committed vpon the English nation, and commanding them to keepe the peace of the Empire, and to bring with him some of the principall of that gouernment; did elect foure and twentie Commissioners (amongst whom, the Mufti was both the head and aduocate) and gaue them instructions and order to recriminate and accuse the English of many depredations and iniuries: hoping thereby, either to extenuate their owne offences or by pretending iust cause, to leaue themselues at libertie to continue their piracies. And F the Bassa and Citie of Tunes hauing receiued by the said Messenger reprehensions and commands to the like effect, they resolued in their passage to Constantinople to consult with their fellowes of Tunes, who ioyned to them two of their Councell, and gaue them instructions to be assistant: but with this caution, that they should not ingage themselues openly but to obserue the proceedings of those of Algier, and to conioyne with them, except they were enforced to make peace, they should concurre and possible for both to escape, that they should leaue the breach open, and themselues at li- G bertie.

They arriued together at Constantinople in the moneth of Nouember, in that yeare in the raigne of Mustapha, and made their first addresses priuatly to the English Embassadour; subtilly pretending to end all differences secretly with him, because they were vnwilling to answer and discouer to Iustice what infinite spoiles they had gotten; and that if they could accommodate with him, and treat without the authoritie of the Port, they resolued to promise any thing, which they meant not to obserue, and so escaping for the present, they hoped to do more mischiefe, by the aduantage of the securitie of the English, and their owne breach of faith. But the Embassadour refused to treat with them, as being subiects, and not sui iuris, and to giue them any hearing, but in the presence and by the mediation of the great Vizier. H
Whereupon they applied themselues and returned to their resolution of com[illegible]t: And the Embassadour prosecuting their accusation, after many meetings and disputes, by the interposition of Halil Bassa there was an Amnestia accepted on both parts, and a peace concluded on the Articles and conditions ensuing. Which were ratified by the proper signature of the grand Seignior Mustapha, and reconfirmed by Sultan Morat, proclaimed in Tunes and Algier, and recommended by seuerall letters from the Vizier and Captaine Bassa, to the Bassa's, Caddees, * and Councell of both Cities.

Imperiall Commands sent by the Gra[illegible] Seigniour to the Bassa's of Tunes and Algier, Caddees, Aga of the Ianizaries, Dyes, Captaines, Antients, and other Gouernors. I

OVr high and Imperiall Firmo being come vnto yon; Know, That from the time of our great Grandfather, Grandfather, and Father of happy memorie, the Kings of England haue alwayes been firme and constant with all sincerities, in friendship, league, and correspondencie with the Imperiall Port, our glorious Progenitors, and with our Maiestie. And in conformitie of the Imperiall Capitulations, league, and Peace heretofore agreed on betweene both parties, and alwayes vntill now obserued of Vs; Forasmuch as the English Nation, their Merchants and subiects, with their K merchandise, ships, and goods, are free to come and go, traffique and negotiate safe and secure in all the parts of our Empire; it hauing neuer beene our Imperiall will and permission, that by any of our subiects or slaues they should at any time be troubled, spoyled, or damnified. Which Nation while (vnder the shadow of our iustice and protection) they passe through the seas with their ships and goods for traffique and negotiation, diuers of you my slaues of Algier and Tunes, without consideration or respect of the friendship, peace, and league betweene vs and the said King, whersoeuer you meet with the ships of the said Nation, either at sea, or in any port or hauen, you take the said ships, L spoyling them of their goods and merchandises, making slaues and killing the men which you find in their ships, a thing not onely vniust, but also contrarie to our Imperiall Capitulations. Wherefore, that for the time to come the said nation should not be so vniustly spoyled and indamaged, there haue been sent to you diuers times our Imperiall and expresse commands: But you shewing your selues arrogant and disobedient (as we vnderstand) do still continue to rob and spoile the said English, contrarie to our said Capitulations, intention and will. The concourse of Merchants and traffique being the nutriment and splendor of Kingdomes; you shall vnderstand, that it is by no meanes our Imperiall will, that the said Nation, now in league and friendship with vs, be any more in like sort, contrarie to our capitulation, will, and promise, spoyled and molested. Which iniuries and other wrongs done vnto them, being a great dishonour to our State and Imperiall Maiestie, all you haue not only deseruedly fallen into our displeasure, but also are worthy of all disgrace, shame, and punishment. And to the end hereafter all things may be performed by you according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capi- M tulations, and that all such as haue committed such insolencies and spo[illegible]es, be apprehended and worthily punished, we haue at this present vnder our Imperiall hand [illegible] and commanded, and haue sent you this our Imperiall Commandement by this bringer our se[illegible]nt Mehemet Aga, who as soone as he shall be there arriued, we command you that you call together all, great and small, noble and meane, which dwell in the said place of Tunes, and publiquely in the presence of them all, with a loud

A voice you shall reade this our Imperiall commandement. And after that, with the assistance and aid of this our Messenger, you haue deliuered into the hands of the English men, there appointed for the same, without further excuse and delay, all such Englishmen, their goods and merchandises and ships, which haue been taken, contrarie to our Imperiall capitulations, from the said Nation; all those transgressors and malefactors, whosoeuer they be, who haue committed these outrages, and caused such disturbance to the peace, league, and friendship, you shall without any fauour chastise and punish according to their deserts. And afterward ye shall haue care, that the Nation, Merchants
B and subiects of England be not so vniustly spoyled, hurt, or molested, contrary to our Imperiall promise and will. Therefore you shall publiquely protest and declare vnto all, That hereafter no man do trouble or molest them, but rather meeting them in any place whatsoeuer by sea or land, to helpe and succour them, obseruing the termes of true peace and friendship, according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations; and that euery one take heed and beware, that he doe, or permit nothing to be done contrarie to our will, peace, and Imperiall Capitulation. And especially you shall looke and procure all things to be obserued, conformable to this our Imperiall will. And if, according to the an- tient custome, the King of England will establish there any Consul, we command, that the said Consul, as also the Merchants and other subiects, be accepted, assisted, and protected at all times, according to the intention of our Imperiall Capitulation. And all of you, with all your care, endeauour, and diligence, shall alwaies prouide that the said Nation may passe free and secure vnder our Imperiall protection and shadow, and traffique and negotiate, buy and sell through all the parts of our dominions, to their content and full satisfaction. And if after the date of this our Imperiall Commandement, we shall vnderstand that the said Nation be againe robbed and spoyled by you; be you hereof
C assured, that our true slaues and subiects are those which do obey our Lawes and commands, and obserue our will, as also it is written in our Alcoran, Obey God, the Prophet, and your soueraigne Lord: But those that do not obey nor obserue our Lawes and commandements, are not our slaues nor subiects, but rather by their disobedience do fall into our displeasure, disgrace, and malediction. For which, our Imperiall commands shall be sent throughout all the parts of our Empire, especially to Tunes and Algier, and to all the Ports of Natolia and Grecia, and to what places soeuer else they shall come, to be alwayes driuen from thence, abandoned, and punished, and by all our Officers and gouernors persecuted. Therefore take you heed, that you say not hereafter you were not warned hereof before hand, but giue notice publiquely vnto all men, of the effect of this our command, D and look that you cause euery man to be obedient thereunto. By which doing, you shall be blessed of God, and obtaine our fauour: for if the said English nation be againe troubled and molested, and the king of England do send any forces against those transgressors, to chastise and punish them, do you consider, that it shall displease vs, that ye are the cause to disturbe the peace and friendship betweene vs. Therefore take heed and beware of all such actions as may any way tend to the disturbance and violating of our said peace and friendship. And it being our chiefest desire, that this businesse be duly fulfilled and effected when this our Imperiall commandement shall come vnto you, and that you haue per- formed our will therein, and shall haue deliuered into the hands of the Englishmen, all such men, ships, and goods as haue been taken from them, you shall aduise vs particularly and punctually thereof, and in what maner you haue satisfied and contented them, and send the same to our Imperial Port.
E And all this let be knowne vnto you, giuing alwayes credit and obedience to our Imperiall Firmo.

The great Viziers Letters to the Bassa's of Algier and Tunes.

F

TO the high and honourable Bassa: To whose noble presence sendeth infinite salutations tending vnto all loue: And to the honoured among the Iudges, and Fountaine of wisedome and eloquence, the Caddee of Algier, whose wisedome be encreased: and to the renowned among the great and honourable men, the Aga of the Ianizaries of Algier, whose dignitie be augmented; and to G the famous amongst their equals the Dye and Captains of squadrons and companies, and other chieftaines and antients, whose dignitie be aduanced.

AFter our louing salutations sent vnto you, our aduice is this: Whereas of a long time the Kings of England, with all sinceritie and good correspondencie, haue alwaies beene true, firme, and constant friends to this Imperiall Port and our Emperour, Soueraigne of the whole earth, whose Empire the mercifull God protect vntill the day of Iudgement; and according to the said friendship, league, and Imperiall capitulations agreed on betweene both parties, It was alwaies the minde and intention of our Emperor, That the Nation, Marchants, and subiects of England, might with their ships and merchandises, goe and come, negotiate and traffique, safe and secure through H Empire, and that they should by no man be troubled, molested, or hindered. Notwithstanding, diuers of the slaues of Algier, without respect or regard of the said friendship and amitie, and contrarie to the Capitulations, minde and will of our Emperour; whersoeuer either at sea, or in any Port they meet with any the said English ships, they rob and spoile them, and take away their goods, and the men they kill and make slaues: which wrongs and grieuous offences, that they might be remedied and amended, diuers times many expresse orders, protests, and other commands haue beene sent to you. But because the said slaues of Algier could not be quieted, but rather do continue to commit the same insolencies (whereof his Maiestie hath beene againe amply enformed) tow[illegible] of their disobedience against the will of his Imperiall Maiestie, and of the losses and wrongs co[illegible]ually done to the said Nation; he hath now vnder his Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded and sent you his Imperiall commande- I ment, to the end the said malefactors may be apprehended and duly punished: for which end we haue also thought it necessarie to send you this our present letter, which when you shall receiue, it behoueth especially that you vse all your diligence and care, about this particular businesse: and cause that in the publique assemblie and presence of all, great and small, noble and meane, souldiers, Gouernours and others, the said Imperiall command bee read; and that all such persons as haue committed such disobedience and spoiles, be apprehended, and with the assistance and aid of the bringer hereof, and the said commandements, let all such ships, goods, and men, be taken and recouered from them, which they haue taken from the English, and all entirely without any contradiction bee deliuered and giuen into the hands of the Englishmen there appointed to receiue the same; punishing seuerely all such whosoeuer they be, which haue committed such spoiles and robberies, as disturbers of the peace & amitie; K and yet shall cause, that in time to come no hurt or violence be done to the said English Nation, their goods, ships, or men, by any person whatsoeuer. And if (according to the Imperiall Capitulation and antient custome) the King of England will establish there any Consull, you shall receiue him with all courtesie, and protect him in all occasions. And to conclude, you shall be carefull to fulfill and obserue all such orders as are written in the Imperiall commandement, forasmuch as the will of the Emperour is, That the said Nation may be in peace and quiet estate. And if after the date hereof we shall heare, that the said Nation be againe so damnified and spoiled, your disobedience thereby will euidently appeare, and that all is done with your knowledge and approbation. Wherefore know yee for certaine, that our Emperour will inflict the same punishment vpon you, which is due to such offen- L dors. Therefore with all your diligence and care you shall prouide, that none be permitted at any time to commit the like spoiles, nor to fauour any such whomsoeuer: but you shall alwaies obserue and fulfill the will and command of his Maiestie, and not suffer any fact to be done by any man, preiudiciall thereunto.

A Letter from the Captaine Bassa to Isuph Dye, in Tunes.

M

TO the esteemed among his equals Isuph Bassa, whose dignitie be euer augmented. After our respective salutations, we let you know, That whereas for many yeares past, vntill this present, the Kings of England haue euer beene sincere friends to this Imperiall Port, diuers of the souldiers and other officers of Tunes and Algier, without regard and respect to the peace and Imperiall Capitulations, meeting either at Sea or in any harbor the English ships, they do take and sp[illegible] them and iniustly

A iustly rob them of all their lading and facultie, imprisoning and killing the subiects and people of the said King of England. Wherefore to the end that hereafter, contrarie to the antient League, Peace, and Imperiall Capitulations, the said English may no more be molested and spoyled, and that such transgressors of the Imperiall will, command, and Capitulation, may by all means be found and duely punished: by this present bearer here is sent an expresse Imperiall command; in conformitie whereof this our letter is written particularly to you. Which arriuing, it is conuenient, and it behoueth you, that you especially vse all your diligence and care, that from henceforth the said English nation may no more, contrarie to the will, minde, and Imperiall Capitulations, bee so vniustly damnified; but that you liue with them in all good peace and friendship; and that all such which B shall transgresse, and commit any act contrarie to the Imperiall will and capitulations, may be punished by Iustice, the which with all your power and diligence you shall attend to fulfill and obserue.

A Letter from the Captaine Bassa, to the Bassa Caddee, and other the Officers of Algier.

TO the great and illustrous Bassa, and to the fountaine of wisedome, my Lord the Caddee; and to the great and courteous Lord the Ianizari-Aga of Algier in Affrica, whose degrees be al-
C waies augmented, and to the esteemed among their equalls, the worthy Dyes and Captaines of the footmen, Leaders of Companies and squadrons, and other gouernors; and to all Commanders of ships, and other the Antients of the Countrey, whose dignitie be alwaies encreased. To whose presence hauing sent infinite salutation, our louing and faithfull aduice is this; Whereas from antient times vntill this day, the Kings of England haue euer remained firme and perfect friends with the Imperiall and high Port, and the will of his Maiestie hath euer beene, that according to the peace, league, friendship, and capitulations long since contracted on both parts, the subiects of England might at all times safely and securely go traffique and negotiate in all parts of the Imperiall dominion; and that no iniurie or molestation should be done vnto them by any person whatsoeuer. In conformitie whereof, while the said Nation vnder the shadow of the Imperiall protection doe passe in the seas in D their affaires of merchandise and businesse, diuers of the souldiors and other Officers of Algier, without respect or consideration that the said Nation are in league and peace with our Emperor, meeting them in the sea, or in harbour, they do take the said ships, and doe carrie away their goods and merchandise, imprisoning or killing the men found therein. And whereas in times past, that the Imperiall Capitulations might haue bin obeyed and obserued, and the said Nation no more in such manner iniuried and damnified, there haue been diuers expresse Imperiall commands sent vnto you. But now of new, his Maiestie hauing beene fully informed of your disobedience continued against his Imperiall will, and of the iniuries and outrages committed vpon the said Nation; and considering, that commerce and traffike of Merchants are both the nutriment and splendor of kingdomes, and that a nation now in league and peace with the Imperiall Maiestie, should be so vniustly, contrarie to the E Imperiall Capitulations, wronged and molested, to the great indignitie of the Empire, and dishonour to the fame of his Maiestie. To the end that from henceforth the antient league and peace may be truly obserued, and the Imperiall Capitulations duely obeyed, and that all such transgressors and malefactors may be speedily taken and seuerely punished, his Maiestie hath now vnder his Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded, with which we also send you our present letter: Which arriuing, we do hope that all you will be obedient, and euer obserue the tenour of the said Imperiall Commands: and that all such that shall hereafter transgresse the will, command, and Imperiall Capitulations of his Maiestie, and shall commit any act contrary thereto, be duely punished according to Iustice. And that you will take care to liue quietly and in peace, and with all your diligence that you follow and obey the will of his Maiestie.

offendour; if not, he shall then certifie the cause to his Maiestie of England, or elseto his Embassadour resident in our happie Port, to the end that the disturbers of the publike peace, may be duely punished. In conformitie whereof, if for the time to come any of theinhabitants of Algier and Tunes shall haue committed any action contrarie to the Imperiall capitulations, by continuing to trouble or quarrell with the said English Nation, the said Consull shall make certificate and complaint to the Beglerbegh and Commanders of the armie, who shall alwayes seuerely punish all such malefactors, to the end that those of Algier may be carefull, neuer to do any act preiudiciall to this Peace and amitie.

III. All those English slaues which shall be found now in Algier shall be set free, who with a note or list of their names shall be deliuered to the said Consul at his arriuall, in exchange whereof there shall be another list giuen vnto the said Consul, of the names of diuers Mussulmen taken not long since by their English ships and made slaues: which list the said Consul shall send to his Maiestie of England to procure their libertie; and in this particular, of either side there shall be vsed no fraud or deceit.

IIII. For the time to come, all the Merchants and other English which shall arriue at Algier or Tunes, shall be receiued, cherished, and protected from all wrong and iniury; and as in all other parts of the Empire they doe safely and securely traffique and trade, so also they shall peaceably, quietly, and safely go, come, and negotiate in these cities, without any molestation, and alway they shall liue according to the antient Capitulations.

V. That the ships of Algier and Tunes, small and great, meeting with any English ships vpon the sea, or in any port, or seale, or otherwhere, shall alway salute one another; and the English shewing their Colours, that they are English and friends, there shall be no disturbance or quarrell betweene them, but all mutuall courtesie shall be shewed; and they shall do one to the other all such offices of friendship as may encrease and fortifie this good amity and correspondence: and there shall neuer be done any wrong or outrage one to the other; prouided that the English Shippes shall not take part nor assist the enemies of the Imperial Port, nor transport in their vessels the armes or faculties of our foes, nor protect nor defend them. And if it shall happen after this conclusion, that it shall be found that any English Ship shall so carry or protect the goods of our enemies, they shall stand to their perill and receiue punishment; and yet this our accord and peace shall remaine safe and vnbroken vntill the day of Iudgement: And thus alwayes with vs, with all care and respect the antient and Imperiall Capitulations and commands shall be reuerenced and obeyed.

Which Commissioners, (to say) the two Mufties, Cadeas, and other diuers mentioned in our presence made answer, That, We allow to name and beleeue of our day of Algier, and as the generall Procurators thereof, are content, and do accept of this accord and agreement, and we doe sweare and promise to obserue the same: and that for the time to come, on our parts, nor on the behalfe of our successors and posterie, there shall nought any wise be committed nor suffered in preiudice or disturbance of this Peace and accord. All which foresaid Commissioners hauing before professed promise and sworne; the said English Embassador did also say, That he, in the name of his Lord and King, and as his full Procurator, do accept and receiue these Capitulations, and do promise, That the Subiects of his Maiestie my Lord and Master, shall alway maintaine with the Subiects of his Imperiall Maiestie,

A stie, peace, acording to the antient Capitulations; and that neuer on our parts shall be done any act of wrong, iniurie, or hostilitie: and at all times, when of either side there shal arise any controuersie, or be done any iniustice, that this peace shall not therefore be broken, but that the malefactours shall be sought out and duely punished.

Which declaration made on both parts, it was by vs registred and published, and this our present assurance and writing giuen the first of the moneth Gemaziel, in the yeare of Mahomet, 1032, being the middle of March, 1622.

The Captaine Bassaes Letter to his Maiestie of Great Britaine, concerning the Peace with Tunes and Algier.

C TO the mightie and renowned Prince, chiefe among the Maiesties of the Princes of the Faith of Iesus: obeyed of the greatest Potentates, followers of Messiah; onely Director of the important affaires of the Nazeren Nation: Lord of the limits of Honour and Power; Protector of greatnesse and authoritie; sincere friend to our most high and dreadfull Emperour: The most glorious IAMES, King of England, whose euerie affaires God accomplish with all felicitie; to whose last dayes we prophesie happinesse and prosperitie, that the Diuine fauour may be propitious in all his wayes. To whose Royall presence when with due respect and honor, Our humble salutations and wishes of pure health, and this our Letter full of sincere loue, shall be presented to the benigne and magnificent mind of your most excellent Maiestie, with al reuerence we giue you to vnderstand:

D THat on your Royall Letter not long since arriuing at this happie Port, the sincere and friendly tenour whereof was to this purpose, That your Maiestie had now for many yeres maintained peace and friendship with the Ottoman Empire, and from the daies of Sultan Morat Han, of famous memorie, with whom the league and correspondence between your kingdomes was first mutually contracted, vntill this time on your Maiesties part there hath beene no defailance, nor act committed in prejudice or disturbance of the said friendship. Notwithstanding for some yeares past, that many your Maiesties subiects haue receiued great dammages and spoiles by the inhabitants of Tunes and Algier, the slaues of the Imperiall Maiestie of my Emperour. Your Maiestie therefore desiring, that conformably to the league and amitie, the said Imperiall Maiestie should punish those people, and for the time to come prohibit such courses: your Maiestie further signifying your constant resolution to continue in peace
E and correspondence with his Imperiall Maiestie my Master. His Imperiall Maiestie with his owne proper hand and Seale, did instantly ordaine and command, That those of Tunes and Algier should answer; and for the future, should desist from all the like depredations, contrarie to the peace and friendly Capitulations: which said order and Imperiall command, was with all expedition dispeeded, with diuers other our vehement letters, by one of our Capigi Bassaes, named Mahomet Aga; who arriuing at those Ports, the officers, souldiers, and other Mussulmen of both cities being assembled, and the said Imperial Orders & Commands publiquely read, with one consent they answered, It is verie true, wee are slaues and faithfull subiects of the Emperour, and alwaies with our heads bowed to the ground, obedient to his lawes and commandements, and from vs shall neuer proceed any act contrarie to the will of his Imperiall Ma-
F iestie. And although the originall cause of these differences, and disturbance of the antient peace, both begun from the English and they, and not we, made the first breaches: notwithstanding we will goe to the feet of our Emperour, and informe him of our owne state and cause, and then let his Imperiall Maiestie doe what he shall please; for we will euer be obedient and obseruant to his Imperial will and command. To which purpose they haue amongst themselues, chosen certaine Commissioners sioners and Procurators whose names are these. The elect and wise Lord the sole Mufti of G that Kingdome, called the Lord Seich Seidi, and the Lord Seich Salmi Mufti of the citie, and the two Iudges of the countrey, two that haue beene Gouernours of the citie, two Colonels of the armie, two Captaines of foot, and two of the Antients of their Diuan, or Councel-hall, with some other assistants, persons discreet and worthie of such imploiment, whom they haue sent with their petition to this Imperiall Port; whose arriuall being made knowne vnto his Imperiall Maiestie, with the differences and contracts, which for some few yeres haue hapned between the subiects of your Maiestie & them. His Imperiall Maiestie my Lord, did instantly & expressely command, That for the time to come between those of Tunes & Algier and the English Nation, there should not be nor remaine, any further quarrell or dispute, nor word or act iniurious, one to the other; but that according to the antient peace and friendship long H since contracted on both parts, all tearmes of friendship should be establ[illegible]d and obserued betweene them: giuing expresse commission by mee his absolute minister the grand Vizier, That the reasons and pretences on both parts should bee heard before vs, and there decided and concluded, and their differences conuented into a good and holy peace and amitie. In obedience to which order, wee hauing called before vs all the said Procurators of Algier in presence of the famous, & prudent, the illustrious Embassador Sir Thomas Roe, resident in this happie Port, of whom hauing demanded for what cause they had done spoiles and wrongs to the English Nation; they gaue answer, That antiently betweene the English and vs, there was held a strict peace, friendship, and commerce; and that our ships and theirs meeting in the seas, did shew one to the other kindnesse and amitie; and that neither from their parts nor I ours, was any offence, so that this loue among vs did daily encrease and augment; That the English Nation did maintaine a Consul in Algier, a man of qualitie and credit: and whilest we day and night did studie to aduance the said friendship between vs, an English ship in the Port of Alexandria, did take in diuers our Pilgrimes, and other our Musselmen passengers, with promise to transport them to Algier, of whome some they after set on shoare vpon a desart Island, where they perished with cold and hunger; and the rest being the greater part, they carried and sold to Malta; which pilgrimes Mahometanes being borne in Algier, their parents and kindred made often and earnest exclamations in our publique Councell. After this, another English ship being come to our Port of Algier, and anchored certaine daies, according to custome, the English Consull going aboord with one of our captaines of foot to make search, K they threw ouer and drowned our officer, the Consull making escape with the ship, who presently departing for another of our Ports called Bigia, our people there esteeming and trusting the English, as our friends, vnder colour thereof, hauing enticed aboord the Captaine of the castle and two of his sonnes with diuers other Musselmen, they carried them away by force, and sold them in the State of the Duke of Florence: another of their ships being arriued at Algier, hauing taken in diuers Musselmen passengers to transport them to Tituan, they carried them and sold them in Spaine. Since, the said English being vnited with the King of Spain our capitall enemie, with their ships haue often made warre vpon vs, and shot with their ordinance into the castle of Algier, and attempted to burne our fleet in our Port (though therein failing) which alliance with our enemies and act of hostility, hath made a iust breach of peace and friendship betweene vs: now there being in being a league and Capitulation betweene the L Maiestie of England and our Emperor, by what reason should the said Nation load their ships with the goods, faculties, and persons of our enemies the Spaniards, colouring them as their owne, and transporting them often into the Imperiall Dominions, and meeting with our ships they hide and denie such goods and men, protecting, assisting, and aiding against vs those our mortall foes, affronting and outraging vs many and many waies: for which cause we also haue beene inforced to reuenge our selues, and these differences betweene vs haue succeeded. But if the English Nation had remained constant with vs in peace and commerce, according to the Capitulations betweene ours and their Lord, certainely we had neuer done, or suffered to be done any act or violence contrarie to the league and peace; as also for the time to come, there M shall no disobedience staine vs against the commands and pleasure of our Lord and Emperor.

The Embassadour of your Maiestie hauing heard this co[illegible]int, replied, That neuer on the behalfe or with the consent of the King my Master, can there bee prooued any act contrarie or preiudiciall to the antient Peace and League, betweene his Maiestie and this Port, much lesse can

A can be said, that any Englishman or subiect of my king, as in obedience, hath done any of these things wherewith you calumniate vs: But if any fugitiue Rebell or Pirat, vnder the Colours and name of an Englishman, whom you haue nourished and receiued into your Port, haue committed any such facts, we cannot preuent it, you haue beene in the faults. And doubtlesse the King my Master, if vpon any complaint he had knowne who were the offendors, and that they had returned into England, he would haue seuerely punished such faith-breakers, as in his iustice he hath often done to pyrats. But you and all your Citie of Algier, how often, and how infinite damages, spoyles, and iniuries haue you vniustly done and vsed towards the subiects of the King my master? which you can neither deny nor defend. Which your Embassador hauing with many reasons answered them,
B and particularly shewed the great iniuries done by them; we considering, that if wee should suffer both parts to reply to euery particular, it would draw the businesse to length of dispute, and perhaps stirre vp so much eagernesse, as it would be more difficult to accommodate and appease the sharpenesse and differences between them; we did thus interpose, What is done, is done: Now the command and expresse will of our Emperour to you of Algier, is, and in the name of our Emperour I commaund you, That there be no more remembrance of the enmitie past, but that between you and the English nation peace and friendship may be renewed and established, conformable to the antient league and amitie continued to this day betweene our Emperour and his Maiestie of England, and that in the time to come you shew your selues obedient and obseruant thereunto. Which resolution being published, they answered, That they were readie to obey, and to conforme themselues to the will and com-
C mand of their Lord. And so we haue from this time forward re-integrated and established a Peace and League with the English nation, and do promise to maintain and obserue it friendly on these following Conditions: That we do promise to set free all the English slaues which shall be found in our territorie of Algier; so that the English wil procure the libertie of those Mussulmen slaues taken by their ships: and that a man discreet, wise, and of good qualitie, may be sent to reside Consull in our city, to whom wee promise all faire reception, honour, and courtesie; and that in any occasion, from the part of the English any indignity or insolencie shall be offered, that the said Consul shall resist and hinder it, to auoid scandall, and shall aduise his Maiestie of England, or his Embassadour residing in the Imperiall Port, and procure by all iust meanes, that such malefactors shall be duely punished. And if in any oc-
D casion, on our parts any offence or act of insolence shall be committed, the said Consul shall make it knowne, and demand Iustice; we do promise seuerely to punish such transgressors and delinquents; and for euer we will obserue with all dutie, according to the command of our Emperour, this peace and amitie. To which Consul and Nation there shall neuer be done any outrage or wrong, but rather with all courtesie and honour (as it becomes vs that all strangers should be protected) they shall be receiued, cherished, and esteemed, and there shall neuer to them, nor to any of their goods and faculties, by any way, by any violence, iniustice or iniurie offered. And that our ships encountring with any of theirs in the sea, they shall salute the one the other, and shall shew all manner of courtesie and loue; and the English shewing their Colors that they are English, they shall do one to the other all friendly and accepta-
E ble offices. And we do promise on our behalfes, that there shall neuer be done any act contrarie and preiudicial to this Peace and Faith giuen. Further, we on our owne part, and in the name of all the Souldierie and other Mussulmen of Algier (whom God prosper) and in our owne name, as their principall Commissioners, do sweare and promise, and do accept of these Articles, agreements, and contracts of friendship, and that our posteritie shall also accept thereof, and that vntill the day of generall Iudgement it shall be thus faithfully obserued: That both the people and subiects on both sides shall be free and secure one with the other; and that the English Merchants and their Ships, at their owne pleasure may trauell in all parts; and as they safely and securely go and come into euerie port or dominion of the Mussulman Empire, so they shall now in all friendship come hither, and friendly and peace-F ably be welcome. This their promise and protestation wee haue caused to be written and published. Which your Maiesties Embassrdour accepting, and resting therewith contented, did promise in your Maiesties name for the time to come, That your subiects should obserue the peace, and conforme themselues to the antient Imperiall Capitulations, Articles, and termes of Amitie, maintained till this day betweene your Maiestie and our Emperour. Who hath of vs desired that the said articles should bee registred, and that wee should aduise the whole proceedings to your Maiestie. For which cause we haue written this our most respect- G full letter, to giue you knowledge that this businesse (by the fauour of the propitious God) is concluded with all circumstances, such as were requisite to the antient friendship and faith, continued betweene your Maiestie and our Emperour. Therefore being confident in your sincerities, we hope and pray your Maiestie to be contented with the conclusion, and that by your Order you will cause it to be published throughout all your cities, ports, and harbours, and to euerie one of your Kingdome; that after the date of this our letter it may be knowne to all men, that this peace is renewed and ratified in behalfe of those of Algier & Tunes in the same forme, as with all other the subiects and slaues of our Emperour; to say, That from hence- forth there shall neuer be offered to the Merchants or subiects of your M[illegible]ie, either by H that people or by any other Mussulman any the least trouble or iniurie: and [illegible] hope is such, that this conclusion and confirmation of peace, shall continue and abide firme for many and many yeares without any breach. In correspondence whereof, there is giuen order and expresse Imperiall command, That all our subiects shall for euer hereafter respect and honor the friendship and amitie betweene your Maiestie and our Emperour. And thus much wee haue thought good to signifie to your Maiesty: To whom from the omnipotent God, we do augure and wish all true felicitie, both present and future, both in this and the other World.

The least and humble seruant, Generall of the Sea, Halil. I

The Captaine Bassaes Letter to the Bassa Aga of the Ianizaries, Collonels, Captaines, and others of Tunes, concerning the Peace.

TO the illustrious, and magnificent the Lord Bassa, and to the esteemed among his equals K the Ianizar-Aga of Tunes, and to all the illustrious Collonels of the Armie, Captains of Squadrons, and Antients of the Militia, and to all the souldiers of Tunes, our beloued sonnes; To whose presence hauing sent infinite and sincere salutations, our faithfull aduice is this: Not long since his Maiestie the King of England, our most honoured friend, hauing on purpose sent his Embassadour with his Royall Letter to the most potent Emperour, giuing notice thereby of his constancie past, and firme resolution in time to come, to maintain the peace and league with this Imperiall Port, did therewithall complaine, That for some yeares since, betweene the souldierie of Tunes and Algier and the subiects and Merchants of England, there haue happened many losses and discontents, requiring therefore that his Maiestie, our L Emperour, should giue remedie to such inconueniences. His Imperiall Maiestie instantly with his owne gracious Affirmo did commaund and order, and gaue diuers his Imperiall commands, which were sent vnto you by our Capigi Bassa, Mehemet Aga; which being publiquely read, you all vnitely gaue answer, That you were readie and disposed to obey and obserue the will and command of our Lord, and that you would neuer hereafter vse, or shew any enmitie, or make any quarrell with the said English Nation; yet notwithstanding, since, you haue sent two of your citie in companie with those sent from Algier with order to attend our aduise and resolution. For which your promptnesse and obedience shewed, we pray Al- M mightie God alwaies to keepe you in his protection, and [illegible]ue you honour and victorie; and his Imperiall Maiestie doth blesse you, as we also doe, [illegible]d you our benediction. Therefore now my beloued sonnes, know yee, That this businesse by the order of his Maiestie was by

A by vs treated and concluded; and the absolute will and command of our Emperour, is, That as well you of Tunes, as those of Algier, all whosoeuer for the time to come shall liue in quiet with the English Nation, and shall keepe with them a sincere peace and amitie, and their ships either comming to any Port of our Dominion, or going to any other Port, their merchants, faculties, and goods, shall passe quietly without any molestation, dammage, or iniu-[illegible]ne by you; and that you for euer keepe with them a true peace and correspondencie, it B being a matter so cleere, that your are many waies obliged to obey the will and order of your Lord, especially seeing it is not onely the will and pleasure of his Maiestie, but of the whole Empire, Gouernors and Ministers with vs. It therefore behoueth you hereafter to liue in peace and friendship with the said English Nation, as you haue done in times past, and so to proceed in all occasions with them, that neither from you nor them there may be giuen any the least cause of distaste. But rather that you vse all courtesie towards them, and to all their ships which shall come vnto the Ottoman Empire. Further, what English Slaues soeuer are found in your Iurisdiction, you shall giue them libertie, and deale with them in such manner in all things, as there may be no more occasion to write you new Commands.
Moreouer, we vnderstand, that since the receit of the mentioned Imperiall Letters and C Commands, and after you had promised obedience, and made an Order, That from that time you would not do any act contrary thereunto; notwithstanding, our Captain Sampson, not far from Modon meeting with an English ship, did take and make her prize: But our Capigi Bassa Mahomet Aga returning that way, caused him to restore the said ship: but the said Sampson tooke seuen or eight English men, and carried them away, with promise to set them free at Tunes. Which action after the peace was concluded (or whether afore or after) at the arriuall of this our letter, you shall restore to libertie all the said English men. And further know yee, that I haue written my Letter to his Maiestie the King of England, aduising him of the Accord, Articles, and conclusion of amitie made and confirmed by D vs, and haue giuen his Maiestie our assurance for you, of a sincere peace and friendship. Therefore, my Sonnes, take heed to the obseruation of this Conclusion and Accord made, that it may abide constant and inuiolate. And so wee rest praying.

The Captaine Bassaes Letter to the Bassa of Algier, to the Ianizar-Aga, and the chiefe of the Armie. I

To the magnificent and illustrious Lord the Bassa, to whose noble presence infinite salutations, and to the renowned and famous among his equals the Ianizar-Aga of Algier, to the Collonels of foot, Captaines of squadrons, and Antients of the Armie; and in generall to all the well deser-uing our companions, and other souldiers, whose prosperitie we wish. After our salutations we giue you to vnderstand, That whereas the King of England, hath of long time beene a sincere obseruer of the peace and amitie with this Imperiall Port, and that of late yeres betweene the souldierie of Algier and Tunes and his subiects, there haue happened many dessentions, troubles, and losses, his Maiestie of England hath sent his Embassadour with his Royall Letter to this Imperiall Port, complaining of K the depredations, iniuries, and spoyles, done to his people by you the souldiers of Algier; and hath desi-red that his highnes our Emperor, should command, that you should desist to commit the like outra-ges, that the peace might be renued and confirmed a on both parts: In conformitie wherof, his Imperial Maiestie our Lord, with his owne Royall Signature hath giuen diuers Imperiall commands, which not long since were sent vnto you by the esteemed Capigi Bassi Mahomet Aga, which order being read in the publique councell, and the will and pleasure of our emperor fully conceiued, you haue seemed to shew all obedience and reuerence to the Imperiall commands, but withall haue answered, That we hauing receiued and suffered many and great losses and wrongs from the English Nation, doe desire to in-forme his Imperiall Maiestie of euery particular, which being heard in all dutie we will conforme L our selues to his good pleasure and command. For which end, you haue among your selues elected the wise and esteemed lord the prouincial Mufti named Seich Seidi, and the prudent the Mufti of your Citie, Seich Salim, and the two Caddees Iudges of the Court, and two lately Gouernours among you; two Collonels of foot, two Captaines of squadrons, and two, of the Antients of your armie, assisted with other persons graue and discreet; whom together with the said Mahomet you haue sent to this high Port, whose arriuall being made knowne vnto his Maiestie our Emperour, and relation made how by the assistance of God, after a combate of three daies, you haue taken from the enemies of our Law, a ship of seuen deckes, in greatnesse like vnto a mountaine; in which vessell you haue found two Gentlemen, young and worthie to serue in this Imperiall Court, whom you haue presented hi-ther: and that day and night with all your industrie you doe indeauour the honour and exaltation M of the Imperiall Maiestie; the said Mussulmen your brethren by you deputed, haue beene receiued with honour to haue touched with their eyes the euer victorious [illegible]rop of his Imperiall Maiestie: in regard whereof, his Highnesse (whom God alwaies prosper) hath sent you his benediction, and wee also doe pray, that in this and in the next World, you be full of honour, and that our Prophet may grant you glorie, and victorie ouer all the enemies of our faith; and be assured, That in the light and darknesse,

A darknesse, we will not cease to beseech the diuine Maiestie, to exalt the glory of our Mussulman law, and to giue it triumph and encrease. Which ceremonies passed, the differences also betweene you and the English Nation, haue been certified to his Imperiall Maiestie; who, together with his abso-lute Minister, the grand Vizier, haue commanded vs, and ordained that this cause should before vs be discussed, and by vs compounded and decided. To which end we haue desired the presence of the Embassador of England, resident in this happy Port, and called before vs the aboue mentioned Muf-ties, and the others your Procurators: of whom we hauing first demanded (his Maiestie of England being in peace and amitie with this happy Port) what hath beene the cause of so many iniuries and wrongs done from you; they answered, That, Whereas for some yeares since wee haue liued in B good friendship with the English nation, and their Merchants did come and trassique freely in our Ports, and from vs they neuer receiued the least wrong, an English Ship in Alexandria did take in diuers Mussulmen Pilgrims, deceiuing them with faire promises to transport them to Algier; of whom some they landed vpon a desart Island, where they perished with cold and hunger, and the rest they carried and sold in Malta, and in other places. After this, ano-ther of their Ships riding in the Port at Algier, and we sending aboord one of the Captaines of our Bands, in companie of the English Consul, to make search according to vsance, they threw the officer ouer boord (the Consul making escape:) and setting saile for another of our Ports called Bigia, did take prisoner the Captaine of the castle, two of his sonnes, and diuers other Mussulmen, and made them slaues, and after sold them to the Spaniards or Florentines.
C Since againe a third English Ship anchoring in our Port, tooke aboord diuers our passengers to transport them to Tituan, whom they betrayed and sold in our enemies countries. In sum, we perceiuing the English had broken the peace with vs many wayes, and that dayly we suf-fered many losses and iniuries by them, and that they apprehended all opportunitie to do da-mage to the Mussulman Empire, declaring themselues our foes, and hauing recalled their com-merce and Consul from vs, we were enforced to maintaine the honour of the Mussulman law, and to reuenge our selues. Hauing heard this their answer, we then demanded of the Embassador, My Lord, seeing his Maiestie of England hath euer been a friend of this Empire, how comes it to passe that the English subiects haue done so many spoyles and wrongs to the inhabitants of Algier, the slaues of our Emperour. Who replied; Our intent and purpose with the Impe-riall Port hath neuer been otherwise than peace and commerce; but the great iniuries, rob-
D beries, and murthers committed by you of Algier, vpon the subiects, merchants, and fisher-men of the King my master, are both innumerable and insupportable: How many and many of our ships haue you vniustly betrayed? how many of our nation haue you vpon aduantage killed and inchained? For these calumnies which you haue mentioned, That we by deceit haue taken your Pilgrims and sold them; you shall know, that all those that take the English Colours are not English men, but mingled of all nations; nor were they subiects of my king, but theeues and villaines, fugitiue people, nourished vp by you, which vnder the Crosse of England, for credit perhaps, haue done such iniuries, certainely without the consent and knowledge of vs: and if they had returned, and had beene accused, the iustice of his Ma-iestie would haue seuerely punished them. Mention not therefore Pirats, but name mee
E one man a Merchant, or subiect dwelling in his Maiesties obedience, that hath done you any wrong. But you your selues with your owne ships now riding in your Port, what thefts and spoyles haue you not committed vpon our barques, goods, and men, wheresoeuer you haue met them? How can you answer this? Your Commissioners replied; Your ships and vessels dayly lade the goods and faculties of the Spaniards, enemies of vs and our Law; protecting and defending both them and their lading from vs: which is sufficient cause for vs to make prize of those that assist our aduersaries. But we seeing this discourse to grow into heate and length, did interpose; The will and absolute command of our Emperour is, That whatsoeuer is past shall be forgotten, and that peace and friendship shall be renewed and established.
F And so we giue you to vnderstand by this our present letter, That we haue concluded the Peace and amitie in this forme: To say, That from henceforward, conformable to the times past, the friendship and commerce betweene the English nation and you of Algier and Tunes shall be renewed, and that neuer from you of those ports, shall be done any violence or wrong to the English nation: And as at this present the English, their Merchants, and others, do safely and securely go and come through all the parts of this Mussulman Empire, in like manner they shall come and go into all the territorie

of Algier and Tunes, without any moleſtation, oppreſſion, or violence whatſoeuer: And that for the time to come, the Engliſh Nation may ſend a Conſul to Algier, a perſon diſcreet, prudent, and of eſteeme, whom you ſhall receiue with all courteſie; and that happening any action contrary or preiudiciall to this Peace, you ſhall aduiſe the ſaid Conſul, who ſhall doe his endeauour to preuent all offence, or at leaſt ſhall certifie his Maieſtie of England, or his Embaſſadour reſident at this happy Port; to the end that in all occaſions future miſchiefes may be auoided. To which Conſull you ſhall conſigne all the ſlaues of the Engliſh Nation, which ſhall be found in Algier and Tunes, with a liſt of their names: And likewiſe you ſhall make a liſt of the names of all the Muſſulmen ſlaues taken by the Engliſh ſhips, and ſhall giue the ſame vnto the Conſull, who ſhall ſend it to his Maieſtie of England, that he may procure their libertie. And for the time to come, the ſhips of both ſides great and ſmall, meeting in the ſeas, ſhall ſalute one the other; and the Engliſh ſhewing the Colours of Engliſh men, and making the ſigne of friendſhip, you ſhall ſhew mutually all courteſie, and performe all good offices which may encreaſe this good Peace and correſpondence, without offering any the leaſt iniurie one to the other: And that hereafter there ſhall neuer be any thing done contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulations; but that you ſhall on your parts day and night endeauour the augmentation of this good friendſhip. And the Engliſh ſhips ſhall not lade the armes and faculties of our enemies, nor in the time to come defend nor protect them. And if any ſhall do the contrary, ſuch perſons ſhall be out of protection, and ſubiect to puniſhment, without preiudice of this Peace and friendſhip, which ſhall abide firme and ſtable. And if any quarrell ſhall happen contrarie to this agreement made, that in like manner the peace ſhall not be broken, but the authors of ſuch diſturbance ſhall be duely puniſhed: And if ſuch offence or iniurie ſhall proceed from any of the ſubiects of Algier, that you the officers ſhall immediately giue ſeuere puniſhment: And if the offence ſhall be committed by any of the ſubiects of England, it ſhall preſently be certified to the Engliſh Conſul, that he may do or procure the like iuſtice. And that after the regiſtring of this renouation and confirmation of treatie, there ſhall be a man ſent to his Maieſtie of England with our letters, to the end that his Maieſtie may command and publiſh through all the ports and harbours of his Kingdomes, That this Peace is firmely publiſhed and aſſured; That as both his Merchants and all other paſſengers for the time to come may ſafely and freely traffique and trauell throughout all the ports of the Muſſulman territorie; ſo they may come and go at their pleaſure to the Ports of Algier and Tunes, and in their way they ſhall neuer be moleſted or troubled. And being now that we haue concluded this buſineſſe vpon theſe conditions and Articles, which are accepted, and promiſed to be obſerued on both parts; it ſeemed neceſſarie to vs, and we haue written and aduiſed you of all circumſtances by this our preſent and friendly letter; to the end you, the Beglerbegh, Ianizari-Aga, and all the Colonels, Captaines, and Antients of the Armie, our beloued Sonnes, might know that this affaire hath beene diſtinctly made knowne to his Maieſtie our Emperour: As alſo, that when Bachi Baſſa was at Algier, diuers Engliſh Ships with ſome Spaniards came before your port, and attempted to burne your Fleet. Of this and of euery particular his Maieſty hath bin fully informed: But now ſeeing the Engliſh hath ſhewed all promptneſſe on their part to maintaine with you the like peace and amitie as they do with all the ſubiects of the Muſſulman Empire; it behoooueth that you cancell all that is paſt, and according as his Maieſtie our Emperour hath expreſſely commanded, That the generall Peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed and confirmed according to the antient cuſtome betweene you and the Engliſh Nation; I ſay, my deere ſonnes, and you are bound, conformable to the will and pleaſure of our Lord, to vſe all courteſie and kindneſſe to the ſaid Engliſh, and neuer to offer any the leaſt wrong to their Ships or Merchants, but to obſerue firmely this Peace and amitie, that it may neuer be diſturbed or broken. And ſeeing it is knowne to all, that the Engliſh Nation is ſincere friend to this Imperiall Port, it is your dutie, and reaſon requireth, that all the Slaues and ſubiects of this Empire ſhould be their friends. Inſomuch that this our Letter arriuing, take you heed that you ſhew no contrarietie or backwardneſſe, but according to the tenour written, that youreſt in quiet, and vſe all your diligence and care to preuent euery occaſion and action inconuenient and preiudiciall. And let it be knowne vnto you of certaintie, That it is the will of the Emperour and of vs: and we do deſire, that hereafter there may be no contraſt or diſcord with the Engliſh Nation, but that you alway obſerue according to this our Treatie now written to you, and that you giue no more occaſion to write you new Commands. Therefore receiue our benediction; that is, The iuſt and great God keepe you in the Imperiall protection, and grant you victorie ouer all our enemies, and giue you conſtancie and ſinceritie towards our friends; of which, ſeeing the Engliſh Nation hath alway made demonſtration, certainly it is inconuenient to repay them with iniuſtice, iuſtice. Briefely, we recommend vnto you, That you vſe all diligence and endeauour, not to tranſgreſſe this Order: for we hauing made promiſe for you, ſhall receiue great ſhame and diſhonour; And hauing been both mediator and concluder of this buſineſſe, it behoooueth you to obey and obſerue, according to the true and ſincere Tenour.

Generall of the Sea, Halil.

The Engliſh Embaſſadours Letter to the Dye of Tunes.

TO the renowned and famous Iſuph Dye, Captaine Generall of all the ſouldiers of Tunes, health and friendly ſalutations. We haue found by good experience, that the honour and fame we haue heard reported of you, hath beene grounded vpon your merits and worthineſſe; and wee are hereof extreamely gled, that a buſineſſe of ſo great conſequence as the Peace betweene mighty Princes, is committed to a ſouldier, a man that regards his honour and word. Which vertues we hauing experienced in you, we cannot chuſe but acknowledge; and do promiſe, that both here, and in all parts of the world we will publiſh your name and renowne, as worthy of true honour. Firſt, wee giue you thankes for the courteſie ſhewed to a young man ſent by vs with the Imperiall commands; and for the friendſhip you ſhewed to our Nation, in giuing libertie to ſome poore men, which his Maieſtie my Maſter doth take in good part, and as a ſigne of your loue. We alſo acknowledge your readineſſe to procure the ſealing of the Peace, made here at the Imperiall Port. But withall we deſire you not to ſeeke a quarrell by pretending to ſearch our Ships: You are a Souldier, and know the termes of honour; you know alſo that our Nation are ſouldiers, and valiant men, who will not be ſubiect to any ſuch diſgrace. This point hath largely beene diſputed at the Port, and reaſon on both ſides vrged; wherein it is made manifeſt, that the Captaine of the ſea of this Empire challengeth no ſuch priuiledge, nor can we ſuffer ſo great indignitie. If therefore you intend to keepe peace with vs (of which we doubt not) we deſire you in all friendly manner to accept of the ſame Articles which are agreed with the Commiſſioners of Algier, ſigned by your friend the moſt noble Halil Baſſa, Generall of the ſea, and ſent as ſecuritie for you to his Royall Maieſtie my Maſter; the Copies of all which we haue ſent you: deſiring you to confirme them, and to conſigne them to William Cooke our Deputie Conſul, vntill we haue further aduice out of England; from whence we doe promiſe you to ſend graue and diſcreet men to liue among you, and to bring you the trade and commodities of our Countrey, whereby you and your citie ſhall haue more profit than by a warre with vs. We therefore truſt and hope in your worth, that you will cauſe this Peace to be publiſhed, which is made by generall conſent of the grand Seigniour and all his Miniſters; and that there may be no occaſion giuen by your Souldiers to ſeeke a quarrell with vs, which in the end will cauſe an vtter breach betweene his Maieſtie my Lord, and this Imperiall Port; which you in your wiſedome will auoid: and be aſſured, that on our parts all ſinceritie ſhall be vſed; nor ſhall you haue any doubt, that we will any way, by any aſſiſtance with your enemies, breake the antient Capitulations. Wee are bound to giue you further thankes for the great iuſtice done by you, in giuing order to recouer ſome part of the goods of a deceaſed Engliſh Merchant in your City, and that you haue cauſed neere fifteene hundred Checquines to be repayed to William Cooke. Not doubting but you will continue the like fauour; and be pleaſed to heare the further reaſons of the ſaid William Cooke, and to take order that the reſt may alſo be recouered; it being apparant and true, that there yet is wanting two thouſand Checquines, which the Deceaſed had in money and goods. This worke is acceptable to God, and honourable to you, and it will encourage our Merchants to liue vnder your protection, to encreaſe the friendſhip made betweene vs.

Our laſt requeſt is, That you will ſet at libertie, for my ſake, our poore Countreymen, according to promiſe made by you and the Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour. Thoſe ſlaues will honour you abroad, and pray for you when you are at home, their parents, wiues, children, and friends. Wherein we will endeauour to procure the libertie of any of yours, to our vttermoſt power. And that you will warne

warne an enemie to the peace, one Sampſon, to deliuer backe the goods and men lately taken at Mo- G don, since the Peace concluded: which if he refuse to do, I shall finde means to reuenge it vpon him.
In conclusion, I desire you to accept of this young man, onely sent to deliuer you our Letters, and to carry newes to England of your friendship; desiring you to dispeed him away in two dayes, that hee may the sooner procure from England some shipping to come in trade to your Port. And so I commit you to the protection of the Almightie God, wishing to the honourable Gouernor and Captaine Isuph Dyc, all true happinesse.

From your friend, The Embassadour of England.

H

The Commands sent to Algier and Tunes by a Capigi of the Grand Seigniour, in companie of Iserug the new Bassa of Algier.

[Written by the Grand Segniors owne hand:]

In conformitie hereof let it be obeyed of all my Subiects. I

To the Diuan of Algier.

THe Imperiall Command; To the Caddee of Algier, to all the Doctors and Churchmen, to all the Captaines of Isuph; to all the Commanders, Elders, and Officers; to all the Heads and Antients, and to all the Souldierie of Algier, and my slaues there inhabiting: At the arriuall of the high and Imperiall Affirmo, you shall know; That whereas from the times of happie memorie of my Grandfathers and Fathers (entred into mercie, whose Sepulchres let God glorifie) vnto this K day, alwayes the Kings of England haue with all sincerítie beene in good peace and friendship with this high Port and all my Ancestors; and therfore the Imperiall mind & will always hath bin, That according to the Imperiall Capitulations contracted at the first Treaty betweene both parties, That the subiects and English Merchants might freely and securely go and come into all parts of this well gouerned Empire; and that they should neuer be troubled, hindered, nor damnified by any man, and that the said English with all their Ships should haue safe and secure passage in the sea, vnder the Imperiall protection, and to their hearts content and quietnesse they should follow their trades and merchandise; and whereas in all times past there was neuer done vnto them any wrong or dam-mage by any of our subiects: you my slaues of Algier, or some of you, not respecting the friendship of L those with whom the high Port hath peace and correspondence, do whersoeuer you meet their Ships, either in the sea, or iny port or harbour, take them and all their goods, doing them many iniuries and violences; and contrarie also to the Imperiall Capitulations, do make them slaues, and many others you kill: for which your actions so iniust, contrary to the Imperiall will and Capitulations not long since in the time of our brother Sultan Osman Han (now in mercie placed in Paradise) his Maiesty the King of England hauing sent his expresse Embassadour, and his Royall Letter, aduising him of the wrongs and spoyles (so contrarie to the League and Peace contracted, and the Imperiall will) committed by you: to the end that all you should obey, and with all diligence, care, and respect, should maintaine and obserue the peace and friendship with all the friends of the high Port; that all those who had committed such actions, so contrary to the Imperiall will and Capitulations, should be punM shed; he said our brother did then send you his expresse Imperiall Commands, signed with his hand; which was deliuered vnto you by one Mutafaraga of the high Port called Mahomet, whose dignitie God encrease. Which Commands being read in the presence of you all, euery man did answer, saying, You were ready to obey the Order and Commands of your Lord: but that you had some particulars requisite to be presented to the Imperiall stirrop, and therefore that you did elect certaine of the principall

A cipall of your Countrey, and sent them hither to him as your Procurators: who being arriued in the time of the regiment of my honourable Vncle, and hauing made knowne at the foot of the Throne of his Maiestie, all those your reasons which you had giuen in instruction; He gaue command, that those said Commissioners, come hither in your behalfe, with the Embassadour of England resident in our happy Port, should haue a conference in the presence of my late Vizier Halil, then Captaine Bassa; and that all things there should be accommodated and appeased. Which conference being made in the prescribed forme, there all your grieuances were largely repeated to the end, that by reason of the aboue mentioned inconueniences, there should not happen any breach of the antient Peace and friendship, all matters were then anew pacified, and by writing and new treaty accorded, That according to the antient custome there should be sent an English Consul to Algier and Tunes, and that their B Merchants should safely and friendly go thither, and into all other parts of this well gouerned Empire, and traffique in all ports thereof, and that they should neuer hereafter be any way hindered, offended, or molested by any of you; and for more caution and assurance, there being written an authenticall Letter, sent vnto the King of England, he gaue order and hath appointed a Consul with many rich merchandises arriued in those ports. Which my said Vncle did also then send you his expresse Command, That you should obserue all the said Agreement. But now being newly aduertised, That you my slaues of Algier, who wholly contrary to the last promise, contract, and faith giuen, doe get, take, and spoyle all the English Ships that you meet on the sea, robbing them of their goods, and making slaues of their men, doing them all wrong and damage; and considering the King of England is constant and sincere in his Peace and League with vs, and that the protection and cherishing of his C subiects is necessarie vnto vs; and that for you of Algier, or other of my Beghs whosoeuer, to take vessels, goods, or men from the said English Nation, so contrarie to the last Agreement made, and faith giuen, is a thing much against our will and the Imperiall Capitulations by vs granted; and also it being our will, that betweene you and them there should be a good peace and correspondence, and that the said English Nation may safely and securely trafique in all parts of this our well gouerned Empire, and that no man presume to do them any damage or iniurie, and that for the time to come the tenour of our Imperiall Capitulations in their Land may be duely obserued, We haue sent you this our Imperiall Command, and We do command you,

That euery one of you, of what condition soeuer, do obey according to the tenour of this my Impe-riall Command, sent you on purpose for this onely reason; That whether by sea, or in any other place D where you shall meet any Ship of the English, their people or goods, you do vnto them no violence or wrong whatsoeuer; but alway according to the Capitulations giuen them, and the last treaty and agreement made with you, that you hold and keepe a true peace and friendship with them; and also that you obey according to the commandements formerly sent to you in this businesse; and that you neuer do nor suffer to be done any act contrarie vnto them, but that you with all diligence obserue and obey this my Command sent you: in doing whereof you shall obtaine our fauor and benediction. And seeing according to the agreement made betweene you, there were diuers slaues set free and sent vnto you from England, you also shall set free all those English slaues that shall be found in your hands, and shall consigne them to the English Consul. And that whereas the Ship of England which was sent vnto you with diuers English goods, hauing been discharged, and receiuing your safe conduct, E and returning to their Countrey, being met by some of Algier, who had no respect to the accord and faith giuen, they did take both the Ship and goods, and make the men slaues: therefore that act being very contrarie to our louing peace and friendship, you shall deliuer the said ship and goods and men to the English Consul; and take heed you do not herein shew disobedience to our command, and that those whosoeuer, who haue been so bold to commit such an offence so contrary to the Peace and faith giuen, you shall cause to be seuerely punished. In conclusion, know you, that in no case it is our Imperiall will, that the said English Nation hereafter shall be any way troubled or dammified, so contrarie to our Imperiall Capitulation. Therefore let euery one of you be admonished, That according as it is written in our Law, saying, Obey the Lord God, the Prophet, and the Emperor; that thereby obeying you shall obtaine my blessing; you shall neuer consent nor permit that any thing F be done contrarie to my Imperiall will: for if hereafter it shall be made knowne vnto vs, that the said English Nation shall be againe outraged and iniuried by you, be assured that euery one of you shall fall into my indignation and disgrace, and you shall be punished with all seueritie. Therefore be you aduertised, that the obeying of my Imperiall Command shall be vnto you an assurance and ornament both of glorie and felicitie; and hauing my benediction, euery one of you vndoubtedly shall [illegible] happinesse in this world, [illegible] and all [illegible] my slaues of Algier, according to [illegible] Englishe sincerely and perfectly, and do [illegible] you friends kindely the English. Consul among you [illegible] Merchant [illegible] and whether by sea or in port you shall meet any of [illegible] vnto him all friendship, and vse no [illegible] to aid, defend, and protect [illegible] them: and thus our Imperiall Command [illegible] in what sort you haue receiued and obeyed it, and in what forme you haue [illegible] and referre my will and command, you shall aduise the whole by your answer vnto our [illegible] And thus let it be knowne vnto you, giuing alway credit vnto our Imperiall Signature. G H

To the Bassa of Algier.

THe high and Imperiall Affirmo being arriued, you shall know, Whereas in times past the Gouernours in that Prouince before you, by receiuing the fifts and tenths of the ships, goods, and men, which the Souldierie of Algier did take and rob from the English Nation, and by giuing them leaue and authority to do such depredations & acts, so contrary to the Imperiall Capitulations, the said souldiers haue taken so much boldnesse and daring, I that they continue to do innumerable spoyles and violences vnto the sayd English Nation: which their insolent actions being made knowne vnto the high Port, and there was instantly written and sent vnto them expresse and Imperiall Commands, That in no way, nor by no meanes it was not the will nor Imperiall minde, that the Gouernours should in such sort connive, and so euidently (contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulations) should take any fifts or tenths, nor giue nor permit any licence vnto the said soldiers, to do so iniust things; but that in this particular they should do all their diligence and loue, and that they should neuer take any fifts or tenths of the goods of the said English, stollen by the said soldiers, nor K that they should permit vpon no pretence, that the English ships, goods and men, so contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulations, should be neither by them nor any other, outraged, molested, or damnified; and that if hereafter it should be knowne, that the said Gouernours should notwithstanding anew haue taken & accepted the fifts & tenths of the ships, goods, or Englishmen, robbed and taken by the said Souldierie, and because they haue consented and suffered the Souldierie to do such depredations, wrong, and spoyles, and for hauing also beene the cause to violate the Peace, League, and friendship betweene vs and the King of England; that as faulty guilty men they should be condignely punished. Now being that L we are anew confirmed, if that the Souldiers do not obey the said Commands and Orders sent by vs, and that by you the Gouernors there is leaue giuen them to continue in their iust course of robberie and oppression, and that still you do take the said fifts and tenths, and that you proceed in violating of the Imperiall Capitulations; Know you, That you are fallen into our disgrace, being it is in no sort our Imperiall will, that the said English Nation should be so damnified and outraged. And to the end that all the Commands giuen and sent into those parts for this busines, may be obserued and obeyed, and that hereafter by no means there may neuer be giuen nor permitted any libertie to the said Soldiers to do the like depre- M dations vpon the said Nation, and that neuer you nor any after you, do neuer take any fift nor tenth, nor any part, but that alway the said Nation should be protected and defended, We haue giuen this our Imperiall Commandement, and we do command,

That when this shall be arriued, you shall obserue and do according to this our high and Imperiall

A Imperiall Command; onely giuen for this reason, and also in conformitie of the former Commands sent in this businesse: which you shall obey with all diligence and care; and that you shall neuer take nor accept any fift nor other share, of the ships, goods, or men, that the Souldiers of Algier shall so vniustly take (contrarie to our Imperiall Capitulations) from the said English Nation: nor neuer hereafter shall giue leaue, nor suffer, that the Souldiers, so contrarie to my will and Imperiall Capitulations, shall do such spoyles and depredations to the said English Nation; and that in no case you shall neuer permit that Englishmen shall be there sold, but you shall alway protect and defend them. And know of certain- B tie, That if after the arriuall of this our Command, we shall vnderstand, that the said Nation shall be anew outraged and iniuried, no excuse from you shall be accepted nor heard; and not onely you shall be depriued of your gouernment, but you shall be seuerely punished. Therefore be aduised, and take heed that you commit no act that shall be contrary to my will and Imperiall Capitulations giuen to the said Nation. And in conclusion, take you order that all my slaues of Algier may keepe peace and friendship with the said English; because it is my Imperiall desire, that the said Nation and their Merchants may come, go, and traffique in all parts of our Empire. Therefore do you do all your diligence and endeauour, and to see that the Peace be setled with the said English, and take heed that you commit no negligence C nor errour whatsoeuer. And thus be it knowne vnto you, giuing alway faith to our Imperiall Signature.

The like three seuerall Commands, onely some circumstances altered, according to the requisites of the place, were written and sent to the Dye, and Bassa, and Diuan of Tunes.

This Peace thus concluded and promulged, was well and exactly obserued for fiue yeres, and not one English ship assayled or taken, and at least six hundred Mariners, subiects of his Maiestie, released from a miserable seruitude and captiuitie: vntill a small offence was done to them, which they easily apprehended, to renew their desire of spoyle, by which only they D liue, as being a people without industrie or traffique; there being but one way to maintaine a Peace with them who are glad of any occasion of warre, not to begin, not to vnbinde their hands; for the soule of Wisedome is Preuention. And so wee proceed to our generall Storie.

On the foure and twentieth of March Ali Bassa the great Vizier was sent for into the Sera- 1624. glio; where being questioned by the young Emperour about the affaires of the Persian inua- Ali Bassa the great Vizier beheaded. sion, he was condemned instantly to lose his head, which was executed in the place, and his body throwne out naked into the streets. The occasion of his sudden death was attributed to his dissimulation with the Grand Seignior in the losse of Babylon, and that he had suborned E false aduice that there was no such matter; either for sloath, or feare to take vpon him the charge of the war, with an army that would not obey in the Citie: and the base mony which he had caused to be coyned, being but one fist siluer, with which hee made a whole payment to the Souldierie, putting the good dollars into his owne purse. But indeed the true cause was his owne sordid couetousnesse, who in six moneths had heaped vp an infinite treasure, by sale of all Iustice and Offices; which in the end weighed him downe to the ground, and supplied (like a large spunge) their present wants for the intended warre in Asia. To this dignitie was aduanced Cerques Mechemet Bassa, an antient Vizier, a man of an honest and sincere nature, and one too good for those times; who after he had enioyed his place but a short while, laboured to surrender it, as vnable to support or content the insolencie of the Spahies F in their vnreasonable demands of impossible benefits. In the meane time the preparation for the war in Asia was aduanced, though the resolution to set forward was deferred, vpon hope that by the authoritie of Cherques Mehemet Bassa and other new Ministers, Abassa Bassa might be reduced to obedience, and that great feare and impediment remoued, they hauing vndertaken to endeauour it: though it appeared very difficult, being that he yet continued the siege of of Angria; and that his scattered armie that wintered abroad begun to returne to him from all parts, he would be loth (although the Grand Seignior had sent him another) to trust his life vpon a pardon. G

The Emperour prepares for a war in Hungarie.

While the Grand Seigniour was thus threatened in Asia with the King of Persia and his owne Rebell Abassa Bassa, the Emperour of Germanie made great preparations for Hungarie, to the number of fiftie thousand men, which bred great iealousie at the Port: but his Embassadour the Baron of Carey, lately arriued, to preuent a generall breach, and the expiration of the last Treaty made for twentie yeares at Zilwar, in the yeare 1606, dissembling all the aids giuen to Gabor, gaue the Grand Seignior full assurance, that his Master had no intent of breach with him; but openly disauowed the Truce with the Prince of Transyluania, made at Goding: and that Cæsar would make warre vpon him, vnlesse he might haue all the places H in Hungary, in his possession, restored; desiring onely a neutralitie from the Port, according to the antient Treatie. The Prince of Transyluania, who now repented that hee had giuen away the vse of his late victory, which he might haue enjoied, and foreseeing the storme that was like to fall vpon him, sent to the Port for succours; who with much ado obtained some Tartars, and Commands to the Bassa's of Bosnia, Buda, Caniza, Agria, and Temizuar, to be in readinesse with all their frontier garrisons to defend and assist him in any motion of the Emperor, or else not to stirre: being vnwilling to abandon him, who was then their chiefest bulwarke toward that part of Christendome, whilest most of their forces should be employed against the Persian in Asia; who had then entred Diarbecli (the antient Mesopotamia) and taken Misbin and Merdin, two principal places, and all that Prouince, except Hamit the chiefe I citie, wherein was a Bassa, who defended the same with great valour and reputation: and it was then not knowne where the Persian would limit his ambition, many other parts fearing him for that which he had alreadie done; for he had separated the Arabia's, and all to the East of the Persian sea, from the Turkish Empire; as hauing conquered from Balsara Northward almost all to his owne Derbent vpon the Caspian sea.

Vpon the eighteenth of Aprill the Victuallers for the Asian armie passed ouer the water, but the dispatch of the Vizier and the armie was still delayed, and little speech when they should depart. In the meane time the Persian preuailed, without any opposition of consequence; and no man could discerne the inward cause of this slowenesse, onely the outward appearance was, A suspition and complaint from the Blacke-Sea; the Citie of Caffa hauing K sent their Mufti and other Commissioners to informe the Grand Seigniour, That foure hundred boats of Cossackes were abroad; That they had done great spoyles in the coast of Tartaria and of the Turkish Empire, and taken many shippes laden with prouision for the Port, and forty thousand more armed and horsed readie for some land attempt; which put all those parts into great feare: of which they desired that present care and prouision might be taken and ordered for their defence. Whereupon there was held a new Councell, and Ibrahim Bassa dispatched with thirteene gallies to make gard vntil more aids could be prepared; intending not long after to send a land armie, and the Captaine Bassa with their whole Fleet.

Abassa Bassa reconciled to the Grand Seignior.

Abassa Bassa (the supposed Rebel of Asia) hauing collected his armie together, suddenly rose from Angria, and departed Eastward, hauing done no spoyle to the city nor inhabitants, L but left behinde him a better fame than any gouernor sent from the Port; he now had accepted the Grand Seigniors pardon, and in obedience to his command, and shew of submission, marched directly towards Diarbecher, to vnite himselfe with Hafis Achmet Bassa, as was supposed for the defence of that Countrey, who onely made some head against the Persian. This resolution of his departure did much seruice to that state; for thereby the Ianizaries and Spahies were accorded, and encouraged to go to the warre, who before could not be drawne out, suspecting one another, and fearing Him more than the forreine Enemie: For it was euident, if he had stayed in the way, either the souldiers would neuer haue gone out, or beene subiect to delay, mutinies, and dissentions, by reason of their factions. But now vpon this good fortune to that State, the great Vizier, Treasurer, Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the of- M ficers and armie was passed ouer to Scutari, and mustered the tenth of May, being ordained to march the twentieth: which was expected with great longing, in respect of the Souldierie, who as yet behaued themselues soberly, and made shew of reformation and obedience to Lawes. They were in all about thirtie thousand Ianizaries, and fourtie thousand Spahies, many

A many being gone before to make the Armie compleat, and the place of their Rendeuous about Brussia.

In the meane time a report was spread, that the King of Persia was dead: but that fame gained little credit with the Turkes, who knew it to be an vsuall policie of that King, in hope thereby to slacken the hast of their forces sent against him; but it did rather quicken them, insomuch as they said he had been often dead, but still reuiued to some greater mischiefe.

Biram Bassa was dispatched Generall of the frontier of Poland and Bugdania, with foure thousand soldiers, and order to draw together and command all the Beghs and garrisons, and to raise new forces on that Quarter, in preuention of some attempt feared from the Cossacks, who were in arms vpon the border, and had put all into distraction. To the thirteen gallies be- Biram Bassa dispatched Generall against the Cossackes.

B fore mentioned to make a gard in the Blacke-Sea, were added ten more; who first transported Ieam Gheray Han, to re-establish him Prince of the Tartars, and depose Mechmet, aduanced the yeare before. That resolution was carried very secretly, and though there was some whisper, yet he was not declared vntill the day he kissed the Grand Seigniors Vest, tooke his leaue, mounted his galley, and departed. The cause of this sudden muration was pretended, That Mechmet was accused by the Poles to haue broken the Peace, and so they would pacifie the Cossacks on better hopes: but the truth was, he was suspected, because he had excused to send aid to the Asian warre, being thereto required, as fearing the entry of the Cossackes into his Countrey: and the rather, because his brother Shachin Gheray, who fled twelue yeares before to the Persian, being in disgrace with Sultan Achmat, was now return-

C ned into Tartaria, at the instant when the Persian did inuade the Turkish dominions, as if there had been some confederacie betweene them, both those brethren being braue souldiers: and therefore it was feared that a dangerous reuolt or warre would breake out in those parts. For if Mechmet were not suddenly surprised, it was thought he would defend himselfe and his Possession. When the gallies had performed their seruice to the new Prince, they were appointed to ioyne with the others, and to discharge Ibrahim Bassa; one Huzein Bassa a Vizier of the Bench being sent to that command: Biram Bassa hauing likewise order to haue an eye vpon the Tartars, as well as on the Poles. At the first departure of the first gallies, as soone as they came into the Blacke-Sea, they met with a small Carmisall, who reporting that only forty boats of the Cossackes were before them, the Ianizaries mutined, and forced their

D General to retyre into the Channel, and demanded more strength; who were checqued, supplied with more men, and so proceeded.

Amongst other distractions and reuolts of the subiects of that Empire, the Pirats of Algier and Tunes cast off all obedience not onely vpon the sea, where they were masters, but presuming to doe many insolencies euen vpon the land, and in the best ports of the Grand Seigniour. They began at Rhodes, where the Castle shot at them. Afterward, a fleet of six Pirats of Tunes met with a Flemish ship called the Moon, laden at Alexandreta; with whom notwithstanding their Peace, they fought, and fired her, not hauing any thing but some of the men, whom they made slaues: & after, comming into the port of Salines at Ciprus, they found two Flemings more, and two Venetians, able to fight with two such Fleets. As soon as they E came into the Road they now claimed peace of the Flemings, seeing themselues too weake to set vpon all foure; protesting, That if they would assist their enemies, the breach was on their parts: who thereupon (vnworthily) promised a neutralitie. Then they set vpon the Venetians, the Captaines whereof went ashore to craue protection of the Castle in the Grand Seigniours port; for which the Begh demanded fifty thousand dollars, or else they should take their fortune: which they refused, and so were exposed to their owne defence; and the Pirats beginning with the smaller ship, she made a good resistance, but hauing no helpe, she was thrice fired, and at last burnt to the water: The Captaine of the Dolphin (the greater ship) not shooting a shot, with his men stole ashore, and fired her, being a vessell of eight hundred tunnes, and armed with forty eight Pieces of brasse. The ladings of these two were F valued at three hundred thousand dollars, of which the Pirats saued nothing: and in ill euils it was a blessing, that such a ship fell not into their hands, seeing the cowards were not able to hold such a strong Fort. From thence they sailed to Scandaron, where finding another Fleming, and a Polacra, they surprised both, and then prepared to land: The Aga of the Scale and all the inhabitants fled, and they sacked the towne, and robbed all warehouses; and The Pirats of Tunes and Algier in rebellion.

and not therewith content, they ſet it on fire, ſo that nothing remained but ſtone walls that would not burne. The greateſt loſſe to ſtrangers fell vpon the Dutch and Engliſh; for the former loſt about thirty thouſand, and the later about ten thouſand dollars; and ſo they raigned in the port eight days, and departed. An inſolencie vnſufferable, if that State had any ſence of honour or profit: for by this example there was no Scale of the Grand Seigniour ſecure, and all trade muſt be giuen ouer, if no preſent courſe were taken for a full redreſſe.

Vpon the laſt of May, after long expectation, the great Vizier Cerques Mehmet Baſſa and the Armie for Aſia began to march; and Abaſſa Baſſa had made ſo many halts on the way, that he was greatly ſuſpected of the Ianizaries, that he lingered vpon purpoſe for them; and at the beſt it was feared, he would onely returne to Arzirum, and keepe the ſar[illegible] The Perſians death was no more ſpoken of, but was rather doubted he would be found[illegible]ue ſuddenly neere Aleppo: and the Emir of Sidon did once more threaten Damaſcus and Ie[illegible]uſalem. Thus the miſchiefs and feares of that State followed one another like claps of thunder: For Mechmet Gheray, made Tartar Han the yeare before, being encouraged by his brother Shachin, newly come from his baniſhment in Perſia, would not ſubmit to the Grand Seigniours Order, and reſigne his principalitie to his Couſine Iean Gheray (not long after ſent and made Prince) and therefore he was againe recalled, fearing to put that Countrey to trouble. But before that Order could ouertake him, he was landed, and Mechmet Gheray come down with a great Army to reſiſt him; and the Generall of the gallies in the Blacke-Sea was forced to land both his Ianizaries and artillerie for his defence, and with ſuch power as they could make (not exceeding foure thouſand) to entrench them vnder the countenance of their ordenance, where there paſſed ſharpe blowes in three skirmiſhes, and on both ſides about two thouſand ſlaine; the Generall diſpatching one galley to the Port with aduice, and requiring preſent ſuccours. Whereupon the eleuenth of Iune a peremptorie Order came from the Grand Seigniour, That ſeeing his honour was now ingaged, he would maintaine Iean Gheray, and giue him ſpeedy aids. To which end a Councell was held the ſame day, and reſolution taken to ſend ſupplies, either the Captain Baſſa, who was then ready for the Mediterran, or by order to the Princes of Bugdania and Wallachia. And thoſe brothers, then in poſſeſſion, had no retreit, but muſt maintaine their diſobedience by the ſword, which was a matter of as much danger as euer befell the Turkiſh Empire. Hereupon the Captaine Baſſa with ſixteene gallies went into the Blacke-Sea in aid of Iean Gheray, made Prince of the Tartars, whom Mechmet Gheray had beaten off the land, and forced him to retyre to the Grand Seigniors gallies that carried him thither. The Emperour being ſtill reſolued to giue thoſe people a Prince, ordered all the frontier ſuccours to meet him to place them by force; which was, in the opinion of many that knew the countrey, held a matter of great difficultie, all the Tartars taking part with Mechmet, who had in his Army neere threeſcore and ten thouſand horſe.

Troubles in Tartarie.

In the meane time the great Vizier Cerques Mehmet Baſſa marched towards Dierbecker; from whence there was newes, That the Arabs, ioyned with ſome of the Grand Seigniours forces, had giuen a Checque to the Perſian: which did encourage their owne Army, who were not yet out of feare of Abaſſa Baſſa and his troupes (that ſtayed about Keſarie) earneſtly expecting what part he would take. Yet the ſeaſon being hot, the Perſian aduanced little, but onely forraged the countrey.

The Coſſackes enter the Boſphorus,

Vpon the ninth of Iuly, betweene ſeuentie and foureſcore boats of the Coſſackes, with fifty men apeece (rowers and ſouldiers) watching the opportunitie of the Captaine Baſſa's being ingaged in Tartarie, entered the Boſphorus about breake of the day; where diuiding themſelues, they ſackt and burnt almoſt all the villages and houſes of pleaſure on both ſides the Riuer, as farre as the Caſtles, and within foure miles of Conſtantinople. The principall places were Bainkdery and Ienicoie, on the Grecian; and Srenia on the Aſiaticke ſhore: where hauing made great and rich booty, they ſtayed vntill nine of the clocke in the forenoone; and then all the city and ſubiects hauing taken the alarme, the Grand Seignior came downe to the water ſide, the Chimacham to the water-port: Halil Baſſa [illegible] himſelfe Generall in this tumult, and hauing not one galley ready for defence, he cauſed to be manned and armed all the ſhip-boats, barges, and other ſmall wherries, to the number of foure or fiue hundred, with ſuch people as they could either get to row, or hope to fight; and diſpatched all the horſe and

A and foot in the city, to the number of ten thouſand, to defend the caſtle from further ſpoyle. Neuer was there ſeene a greater feare and confuſion for the time: yet they expected that thoſe poore Theeues would vpon their preparation preſently retyre. But they ſeeing the Turks boats make towards them, drew themſelues together into the middeſt of the channell, not farre aboue the Caſtles, and ſtayed firme vpon their oares in battalion (in forme of a Creſcent) expecting the aſſault, the wind and current being againſt them. Halil Baſſa cauſed ſome ſhot to be made a farre off, but they anſwered not with one musket, but houered from one ſhore to another, without any ſhew of retreit. Hereupon, the Generall ſeeing their forme and reſolution, thought it not fit to aſſaile them with ſuch boats as hee had, but eſteemed it wiſedome enough to keepe them from further attempts; fearing if they had broken his fleet
B of boats, which was eaſily done, that they would venture downe to Conſtantinople, which was now emptie of all defence. And thus theſe few boats hauing firſt made great ſpoile, lay the whole day, vntill the Sunne ſet, facing and brauing that great and fearefull citie of the world, and all the force it could make, and departed with their booty, with their Colours ſpred, vnfought with, or almoſt reſiſted.

This ſmall action and bold attempt, to affront ſo great an Empire, made a ſtrange diſcouerie, how much vnder the reputation, the terrour and ſtrength of that State was then, how weake and vnprouided they were. But as the Oracle commanded them, Firſt to ſeat ouer againſt blinde men, it hath beene their fortune euer to haue blinde enemies. Philip of Macedon had neuer proiected, nor his ſonne Alexander neuer aduentured with ſo ſmall forces, the C huge enterpriſe of ſubduing the Eaſterne Empire, if they had not diſcouered the effeminate and faint courage of the Aſiatiques, by the admirable retreit of Xenophon, and ſwift incurſion of Ageſilaus great armies, not daring to oppoſe the vertue of their ſmall numbers. So wee ſee, of ſmall beginnings oftentimes great matters do ariſe; for by this attempt of the Coſſacks the Poles had abſolutely broken the Peace with that Empire.

Huzein Baſſa ſtrangled in the Court.

Huzein Baſſa that was great Vizier, and vpon the tumult of the Souldierie made eſcape the yeare before (a man turbulent and hated of all men) being at laſt taken and carried into the Seraglio, after he had (by many faire promiſes) confeſſed and reſtored much of the treaſure carried away by him, and giuen to the officers of the Ianizaries to maintaine him, was ſtrangled in the Court, and had the iuſt reward of his tyrannie. And the preſent great Vizier, ſent
D to make head againſt the Perſian, did yet ſtay at Iconium, expecting the Souldierie, who did ſlowly draw to him: ſo that it was thought he would Winter in Aleppo, being not able to proceed in the warre that Sommer.

The Captaine Baſſa, ſent into the Blacke-Sea to eſtabliſh Iean Gheray Prince of the Tartars, was forced to retyre to Caffa, being repulſed from the land; the people maintaining Mechmet in poſſeſſion. Whereupon, to cure the wound with as little skarre as was poſſible, he in the Grand Seigniours name was conſtrained to confirme the other, and to be content to accept a courteſie, for which he gaue ſmall thankes. And Cante-Emir-Emirze hauing againe entred Poland, and done ſome ſpoile by the cutting downe of ſome woods, was intercepted in his retreit, and routed with the loſſe of two thirds of his Armie; and the Poles with a very
E great campe intrenched very neere Chotyn (the fort beſieged by Sultan Oſman in the late warre, and ſurrendered vpon the Peace) expecting the euent of the great troubles on that ſide.

The Coſſackes returne to the Boſphorus.

The Coſſackes after their firſt retreit, returned againe to the mouth of the Boſphorus, with double the number of their firſt fleet, being an hundred and fifty boats at the leaſt: the ſupply hauing lurked behinde, either for ſuccour in caſe of need, or for ſome other aduantage. They ſtayed off and on vpon the coaſt three dayes more, burnt the Pharos and ſome two or three villages. They threatened to come to the Arſenall, putting all the city in great confuſion. Gards were continued and re-inforced in all parts vpon the land; and at laſt, two Gallies (filled with porters and laboring men taken vp in the ſtreets) and about 02 boats were ſent
F out to keepe watch, where they remained at the entrance of the channell. But the Coſſacks with their great booty, and two or three Carmiſals taken, retyred; and ſo the feare was paſt for that time. But ſome of the poore Coſſacks being taken ſtragling too farre vpon the land, confeſſed vpon examination, That Mechmet Prince of the Tartars was confederate with them to this attempt, in reuenge of the offer made to diſplace him. And this confeſſion [illegible]ne the death of Huzein Bassa, who in the time of his gouernment, of a prisoner made Mechmet G a Prince, and gaue libertie to the Lords of Poland that were prisoners at the Port (of whom mention hath been made before) and dispeeded suddenly the Duke of Sbarasky, who if they had then been there, without doubt they had been kept hostages; for in this tumult the A- * Lieutenant to the great Vizier. gent of Poland ranne some hazard, if by the wisedome of the * Chimacham it had not been preuented.

About the foure and twentieth of Iuly the Prince of Transyluania made an absolute Peace with the Emperour, without the knowledge or warrant of the Port: which caused great suspition amongst them; but they bare it both silently and patiently, in regard of their owne troubles then in Asia and other places. Therefore the Prince kept the conditions more secret: howsoeuer, it was knowne that he surrendred and disclaimed all title [illegible] Hungarie, and H consented that the Emperours sonne should be presently chosen King thereof, and keepe his Court in Presburg: That all the Estates of Hungarie should receiue him, and the Prince of Transyluania assist and serue him in all his occasions: That Bethlem Gabor should remain quietly Prince of Transyluania, and Earle of Siculi: That he should hold Cassouia and two or three other Seigniories which he formerly possessed, during life; and after, that they should returne absolutely as members to the Crowne of Hungarie. And this Article did trouble the Grand Seigniour, That the Prince at all had mentioned Transyluania without any relation to him; as if that Prouince had depended of the Empire. Some other Articles there were concerning the estates of priuat men, and mutuall pardons; this which hath been set downe was the substance of the Treaty.

In the meane time a Chiaus (sent by the Grand Seigniour to the Emperour, with the news I of his inauguration, and to offer the continuance of the antient Leagues and Treaties between them) returned to the Port with the Emperors Letter of acceptance, and confirmation of the Treaty made at Zitwa, which was the last: Wherein it was agreed, That what either side possessed at that time, should remaine as it was; and if any road should be made, and prisoners taken, or place surprised (during the Truce) on either part, that restitution and full satisfaction should be giuen by him that innouated. Ali Bassa the Vizier before, and Cerques Bassa at that present, did both of them consent to the renewing of this Treaty, which was often broken; ignorant vtterly of the affaires of those parts, and of the disaduantage to the Prince of Transyluania and their owne State: for hereby the Truce being againe in vigour, K the Grand Seigniour was bound to surrender Vatz, and many other places of importance that had been surprised in a time when there was neither absolute peace nor warre betweene them, and was obliged to make many other restitutions of damage. But the Imperial partie did not presse those smaller matters; onely demanding Vatz and all the countrey depending, held themselues (for their limits) strictly to that Treatie, which was then againe confirmed on both sides. This conclusion discontented many, who laid the blame on the information of the Bassa of Buda, a suspected pentioner of the Emperour: but it was the Grand Seigniours troubles in Asia that made him silent, and suffer both that losse and many affronts from Tartarie and the Cossackes.

Newes of the Turks Army ouerthrowne by the Tartars. There arriued in the meane time from the Blacke-Sea two gallies, which brought the bo- L dies of two Viziers, and certaine newes of the ouerthrow of the Armie sent vnder command of the Captaine Bassa, to plant the new Prince of the Tartars; who hauing landed his forces and artillerie, was routed and beaten, himselfe wounded, twenty eight pieces of ordnance lost, two Viziers of the Bench and about fiue thousand souldiers slaine and taken, the rest saued by flight vpon the gallies; onely the Captaine Bassa with his fleet stayed about Varna to receiue new Order. There had not happened to that Empire in many ages a losse of more importance, in respect of the consequences; an Imperiall Armie beaten, and thereby Tartaria separated from obedience to the Turkish Empire, and that people taught to know, That they were able to make and maintaine their owne Prince. But this was no time to take too much knowledge of that disgrace, Policie teaching them, rather to cure than to make M the breach greater. For the Grand Seignior after that dispatched a galley to the Prince of the Tartars, with a Vest and a Sword to his sonne, and a confirmation to him of his place; casting all the faults vpon the Captain Bassa, and disauowing his attempts; though he was sent with Commission to do it. Which (to make the dissimulation good) was like to cost him

A him his head, being sent for in to answer the same. The sudden yeelding on the Grand Seigniors part shewed a great weakenesse and feare, to flatter a victorious enemie; and it was doubted how the Tartarian would accept a Gift which he had gotten by his owne strength: for if he stood out he would proue a dangerous neighbour, the city of Constantinople alwaies being open to him; for Adrianople and the borders did then feare him, and euen some Cossacks did ioyne with him, although before they had been mortall enemies. Yet to make some compensation of this defection, Abassa Bassa the strong Rebell had made his peace with the great Vizier in Asia; and to seale the credit of his faith by another treacherie, sent in the heads and estates of three of his chiefe followers, to redeeme his owne. Which much raised the dull countenance of that Court; for although the pardon was dishonourable, yet it was seasonable. But they durst not ioyne their Armies for feare of new stirres, for he went toward his B owne gouernment of Arzirum, with promise to keepe it safe; and the Vizier marched slowly towards Babylon, [illegible] then held by the Persian.

About the twentieth of September the great Vizier Cerques Bassa abiding in Iconium, and Abassa Bassa in Kaiserie (neere thereunto) he was earnestly prouokad by the Ianizaries to set vpon him. But the Vizier hauing expresse order, not to make the breach greater with the Rebell, but to vse all meanes to appease him, and to reconcile him to them, would not be drawne to consent thereunto: for which cause, and some other their small discontents, they twice stoned the tents of the Vizier, and wounded him in the head. Whereupon he assembled the Commanders of the Spahies, declaring vnto them the great trust the Grand Seigni- C our had in them; and shewing them an absolute Order giuen him, to keepe good termes with Abassa, and neuer to fall to blowes with him, he desired them to finde some way of pacification betweene him and the Ianizaries: who instantly promised their obedience and aid to execute all his commands. Then the Vizier called together some of the Captaines of the Ianizaries, and persuaded them so to worke with their companions, that a Peace might be concluded betweene them and Abassa Bassa. Who finding their fellowes very vnwilling, had much difficultie to persuade them: In the end it was agreed, that the Vizier should treat and accommodate all differences. Who presently sent to conferre with Abassa; but hee by no meanes would trust himselfe, or giue a meeting; and answered, That he would neuer depart from his followers and Armie; but if that he desired to speake with him in priuat, that hee D should first send his brother the Beglerbegh of Caramania, and Elias Bassa of Natolia, in hostages, and then he would come vnto him. Which diffidence of his much displeased, and the Vizier was constrained to treat the Peace by mediation: which hauing brought to effect, hee tooke his oath three times vpon the Alcaron, To hold him as a friend, and neuer to doe him any violence. The Ianizaries also gaue their consent in publique, promising to maintaine the word of the Vizier: And the Articles of their reconciliation being drawne in writing, were sent to Abassa; who reciprocally made the like Oath, and accepted the Peace vpon the conditions following, signed by the Vizier: That he should be confirmed Bassa of Arzirum: his Son Beglerbegh of Orfa, and his Lieutenant of Maras (all on the borders of Persia) and that he should depart with all his Armie to the defence and custodie of that Prouince, and wait vpon the E motions of the Enemie.

A truce concluded betweene the great Vizier and Abassa Bassa the rebell.

While Abassa Bassa did treat this accommodation, Colophon Mustapha Bassa [illegible] of his Colleagues in all his rebellion) made some shew of retyrednesse from him, and hand to parle with the Vizier apart; and in conclusion wrote vnto him, [illegible] liuer or to kill Abassa Bassa. Which Letters of his being either intercepted [illegible] seeing that Colophon had resolued to sell him treacherously, he called him [illegible] asked him plainly, Why he went about to betray him; and without [illegible] hand, he drew his sword and claue his head, deliuering all his goods [illegible] the Vizier, to consigne to their Master. Then it was anew moued [illegible] aduance with his forces presently towards Babylon, against the [illegible] F maine armie to oppose the Princes of Vsbecke that had made [illegible] thousand garrison souldiers in the Citie. But Abassa refused to [illegible] bound by the Treaty, to returne and make gard in his gouern[illegible] the Vizier, forced to rise and aduance, hee arriued at a [illegible] wherein were diuers chiefe followers of Abassa Bassa; who [illegible] cation made, came out with prſents and victuals to meet the Vizier and his Armie, and were G of him well receiued: but the Ianizaries enuying to ſee them ſo well vſed and honored, in a fury fell vpon them and killed them all (vſing the opportunitie) and entering the caſtle, put to execution their wiues and children, and euery perſon found therein, and all others that could be diſcouered in the bordering villages appertaining to him, to the great diſcontent of the Vizier. Which being knowne to Abaſſa, and ſeeing they had broken their oath and faith, he roſe with his Armie, and marched right to the Imperiall Campe; where arriuing, one of his Captaines with foure hundred horſe began the dance, and without delay fell into the Quarter of the Ianizaries, doing ſome execution for an houre and a halfe: in which skirmiſh there fell on both ſides two or three thouſand. The Vizier ſeeing this beginning, partly forced by the Ianizaries, and partly for his honor, drew vp his whole army to c[illegible] a battel in H their defence. Which Abaſſa Baſſa perceiuing, and that which hee expected not (who hoped that the Vizier and Spahi's would haue giuen him leaue to reuenge many inſolencies vp-on the other) vnwilling to fight with the Grand Seigniours Generall, founded a retreit, and got himſelfe and his armie a mile or two off diſtance. The Vizier to ſhew himſelfe faithfull to the Ianizaries, and to keepe in grace with them, ſent foure Beglerbeghs with their Regiments in purſuit of him: who finding Abaſſa and his Armie in good order, and firme, made ſome ſhew of skirmiſh, to little purpoſe. But they returned to the campe, and told the Vizier, that they had found him in battalion with forty thouſar[illegible] men, and that they were not able to deale with him. The next day Abaſſa with many great threatnings marched away directly for Arzirum; and the Vizier to Diarbecher, for his hybernation; in great diſpleaſure I of the Ianizaries, and the rather, for that he was beloued and protected by the Spahies.

The Tartars make an incurſion into Poland.

The brother of Mechmet Gheray in the mean time broke through the Prouince of Bugda-nia (Radula the Vayuod hauing made eſcape) & entred into Poland, firſt ſpoiling the country, and driuing away all the cattell; and afterward entered Wallachia, and beſieged his ſonne, Prince of that Countrey, in his caſtle of Tergouiſta, notwithſtanding they were ſubiects of the Grand Seigniour. And in ſtead of ſending backe the artillery loſt in the laſt defeat (which was expected) hee entered the Caſtle of Caffa, the chiefe Port of the Negropont, and carried away from thence all the canon and munition, which he tooke vp into the land to his towne of Bagchaiſeray, as if he meant to fortifie himſelfe (a practiſe at that time vnknowne to the Tartars:) which were ill ſignes of ſubmiſſion, and yet the name of Muſſulmen, at any K time when they come to blowes doth eaſily accommodate all quarrels.

Tartar Han ſends an embaſſadour to the Port.

About the twelfth of March following, the Tartar Han ſent an Embaſſadour to the Port, with an offer of his Maſters ſeruice (which was receiued with great ioy) excuſing the enterie of the Tartars into the frontier of the Turkiſh Empire, as being done in ſeruice of the Grand Seigniour, onely to fetch Cante-Emir-Emirze and his followers out of Siliſtria, and to com-pell them to retyre, to auoyd and take away all occaſion from the Poles, to lament the iniu-ries done by them; that thereby they alſo might take the like order for their Coſſackes, and ſo the Peace might be duly obſerued on both ſides. Whereupon a Poſt was diſpatched into Poland, aduiſing what was done, and requiring that on both parts the like correſpondencie might be obſerued; or elſe that the Grand Seigniour would vnderſtand, if the Coſſackes L made any new attempt, that the Peace was broken on that ſide, being they could haue no ex-cuſe to lay the fault vpon the Tartars. This vſe was made of the Embaſſage; yet the Vizier was not without iealouſie of the ſinceritie of the Meſſenger, but thought he was ſent for exploration, to diſcouer the force, preparation, and reſolution of that State: and therefore they made all ſhew of good prouiſions; Armes being giuen out to the Buſtangies, and a great fleet dreſſing for the Blacke-Sea; wherein the Coſſackes had been alreadie ſeene, and rumor made them to exceed three hundred boats: inſomuch that all the inhabitants of the Boſphorus did daily retyre to Conſtantinople. The feare was generall, which was ſufficient argument of weakeneſſe; and the yeare before had ſhewed what might be done with a ſmall and reſolute M Force.

1625. Now that the ſeaſon ſerued, the Perſian prepared to continue the inuaſion, and the Vizier to oppoſe him. All the Souldierie departed towards the Campe, though they intended not to meet, but to make warre by diuerſion. Abaſſa got ſome credit at the Court, and they eaſily apprehended

A apprehended all occaſion to beleeue his reconciliation. One of the chiefe Commanders in the Perſian Armie ſent to Abaſſa Baſſa to perſuade him to deliuer Arzirum (his gouernment) to the Shaugh: which he ſeemingly accepted, and trained him on with eight thouſand men to take the poſſeſſion; when in the meane time he drew together his troupes, and ſuddenly ſent them vnder the conduct of a Prince of Georgia, and ſet vpon them that ſuſpected no treaſon, routed them, and ſlew a thouſand, whoſe heads he diuided, and ſent them for Pre-ſents to the Port and the Campe. Vpon which action, by the multitude he was proclaimed to be the beſt Subiect of the Grand Seigniour, and named to be Vizier. But ſome thought it not ſo great an aſſurance of his fidelitie, becauſe he went not in perſon, nor would come out of his ſtrength, though commanded to draw into the field to aſſiſt in the generall ſeruice; ex-B cuſing himſelfe vpon the neceſſitie of defending the Frontier. Neither could he refuſe to ſend ſome of his followers to this exploit (being vrged thereto by ſome of his Captains) without diſcouering himſelfe too ſoone: his reſolution vndoubtedly being, That while thoſe two great Oppoſites ſtroue for the whole, he would keepe a part of Aſia, and his owne head; knowing that he could make his peace with the ſurrender to the Conquerour, at pleaſure.

From theſe parts were not the greateſt nor neereſt feares; for the Prince of the Tartars (hauing made peace with the Poles, and taken the Coſſacks into his fellowſhip) made ſhew of ſome deſigne againſt the Turkiſh Empire, and the people were very indifferent, many inclining to him. The Coſſacks with three hundred Frigots croſſed the Blacke-Sea, ſacked and burnt the ſuburbs of Trapezond and all the adioyning coaſt; and retyring, were receiued C into the port of Ghioſleue, belonging to the Tartars; which augmented the iealouſie, that they would vnite.

The Coſſackes ſacke the ſuburbs of Trapezond.

At the ſame time there appeared a little Rebell in Natolia, one Ianet Ogli, a ſimple Spahi not aboue twenty foure yeares of age, dwelling in the plaines of Tirria; who vnder the colour of reformation of the Commonwealth, came downe to Smyrna with ten thouſand followers. The Citie amaſed, ſent to Conſtantinople for ſuccours, but receiued an anſwer as cold as their means to helpe them: The Chriſtians fled to their ſhips, by chance in the port; the Gouernor to the Caſtle: But it ſeemed he had priuate quarrels with ſome great men in the Towne; whoſe faction ſent out foure thouſand ſhot to keepe a paſſage; which being beaten, he came before the citie, and executed his will, beheaded two Caddees, puniſhed diuers in-D ſolent ſouldiers, placed and diſplaced the Officers, and proclaiming peace in the Grand Seig-niours name, offended no priuate man, nor did any ſpoyle; but giuing a particular protection to the Conſuls, and promiſing them in their quarrell, if they were oppreſſed, [illegible] with his rod of correction, he departed to his owne home without any further trouble ration of that medicine proued wholeſome, though it appeared dangerous, and he to haue had order from the State, a diſorderly way: but it was likely they did niue at, than approue of that rude execution of Iuſtice. Howſo[illegible] diſturbed Smyrna, he tooke vp armes againe with a greater pow[illegible] punitie or proſperitie of his former attempt; for he marched the State was forced then to take his actions into conſideratio[illegible] agreed. He ſtill vſed the name of the Grand Seigniour, and the dangerous for the vncertaintie.

the gallies, and kept the land, leauing the Armado without ſouldiers to gard it, in danger of the Tartars and Coſſacks. G

The Great Vizier in Aſia gaue command, That no ſouldier ſhould retyre to Winter garriſon, but ſtay with the Armie about Babylon, the fitteſt ſeaſon being then to make the war: diſpoſing himſelfe in the meane time to take in places of leſſe import. Abaſſa Baſſa moued not, and promiſed obedience in all things; but to go out of his Hold of Arzirum he did peremptorily refuſe.

Strange predictions of a great plague which enſued.

The yeare and ſeaſon was full of contagion, which was obſerued by ſome forewarnings, and ſome extraordinarie diſpoſition of the aire and accidents: For, on the eighth of May at midnight there was a great and fearefull earthquake at Conſtantinople, which endured about ſix minutes; and crolling the ſea, was felt in Greece, Aſia, and the Iſlands. And on Munday the twenty ninth of Iune, at night there began a moſt terrible tempeſt, with ſo violent and continuall thunder and lightening, that all the city of Conſtantinople ſhewed as if it had been on fire; at the end whereof fell a ſtorme of haile that brake tiles and glaſſes, ſo that ſtones by report were taken vp of a hundred and fifty drammes; but from credible witnes that weighed diuers of them, the next morning there were found of ſixty and ſeuenty drammes apiece, (which is about ſeuen or eight ounces) wherewith many were wounded. On Sunday the third of Iuly, another tempeſt of thunder and lightning began at Conſtantinople, which burned a woman and her children in their bed, and ſlew much cattell in the field. And the fifth of Iuly the ſickeneſſe was growne to that heigth, that the Turkes proclaimed their publique proceſſion and prayers; which is performed with great ſolemnitie by the Mufti and all the Müllaes, accompanied with the Viziers and the chiefe of the city, attended by the people at a little Moſchie on the edge of the plain of Achmadan, ouer the water on Grecia ſide: which ceremonie is neuer vſed vntill the mortalitie exceed a thouſand a day; which was eaſily knowne by the burials, that were all made without the walls, and account of them were kept at euery port: and that day was numbered onely to go out of the gate of Adrianople nine hundred and ſeuenteene. On the eighth following there died a 1034: by computation of the whole (being many ports of buriall) there could not die leſſe than two or three thouſand a day, beſides Galata, Pera, and Scutari, the infection being ſpred almoſt into all the villages. The ſame day, proclamation was made in the Citie, That no Butcher ſhould kill murton; a murrion or plague (whither was vncertaine) hauing taken that ſort of cattel ſo violently, that they died in multitudes with ſores in the fields; and it was not knowne what they ſhould eat, nor where ſafely to prouide it. The Perſian feignedly deſires peace, and the Georgians ſend their Embaſſadors.

Vpon the approch of the great Vizier toward the Prouince of Babylon, there was a motion made on the part of the King of Perſia, of peace; but it was vnderſtood by the Vizier to be but an artifice to delay his Armie. There came Embaſſadours from the Princes of Georgia, who hauing formerly depended vpon the Perſian, were about nine yeares before betrayed and tyranniſed by him: in reuenge whereof they hauing taken protection of the Grand Seigniour, and the laſt ouerthrow giuen to the Perſian (though attributed to Abaſſa) being executed by a Nobleman of that Nation, they then ſent to offer themſelues in a confederacie of that warre. The meſſage was acceptable, and the Archbiſhop of Calcedon their countryman appointed to receiue, entertaine, and returne with them as Embaſſadour from that Port, to confirme and diſpoſe the whole Nation (who were gouerned by three Princes) to enter into this League, and to make warre vpon the King of Perſia. The race of thoſe three Families had long ruled that Countrey, whereof one was accounted the chiefeſt (though the others had ſeuerall iuriſdictions) of which the maſculine line was then failed, except onely one, who being made Turke young, was a Baſſa neere the Red-Sea. The State ſent vnto him, and made meanes to the Vizier, that he might returne and be their Prince; but on condition that he ſhould become a Chriſtian: but that being denied them, they elected the daughter of their laſt Prince, notwithſtanding their antient Law, that excludes the ſucceſſion and rule of women; and hauing procured therein a diſpenſation from the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, thoſe Embaſſadors had alſo order for formes ſake, to procure the confirmation from the Grand Seigniour; which was granted them. The Ianizaries mutined in the Blacke-Sea being againe appeaſed, the Captaine Baſſa ſent out Sackſachi Baſſa, hauing made a fleet of an hundred and foureſcore frigots, and armed them

A them to keepe the riuers about Oſu, by which the Coſſackes deſcended. Sackſachi arriuing at Oſu, and finding all quiet, on the Biram day went aſhore; and being at dinner, was ſurpriſed by the Coſſacks, and hardly eſcaping, loſt all his fleet, and many of his men. The Captaine Baſſa hauing aduice of his ouerthrow, made all haſt to Oſu, and finding no ſhew of enemie, reſolued to go on towards Caffa; but that night the Coſſackes deſcending with their boats by many out-lets, the Baſſa of Oſu ſent to him to returne ſpeedily and make haſte towards Conſtantinople, for that the Enemie, growne proud with their late victorie, ſuppoſing no other force abroad, were directly gon for the Boſphorus, and were reſolued to aſſault the Imperiall city, or at leaſt (as they boaſted) to burne the Arſinall. Vpon this aduice, the Captaine Baſſa ſet ſaile, and the next morning by breake of day, and in a fog fell in with the fleet of the Coſſackes (conſiſting of three hundred and fifty frigots, that carried from forty to foureſcore musketiers apiece) and was ſo mingled with them, that he could neither vſe his ordnance for the danger of his owne gallies, nor auoid them without fight. Thus engaged, the Coſſackes furiouſly began the aſſault, and being three or foure boats to one gally, boorded them: twice they entred to the maine maſt of the Admirall galley of the Turkes, killed three at the helme, and broke the rudder off; which being againe faſtened by foure Chriſtian ſlaues, and the Sunne breaking out, ſo as the gallies could vſe their great ſhot, and the wind riſing, the Coſſackes were forced to leaue their fight, and betake them to their oares; where in parting, with the ordnance (as was reported) thirty boats were ſunke, and ſix or ſeuen hundred men taken vp. The conflict was bloudy on both ſides, being come to hand blowes, and the Ianizaries almoſt conſumed. The Captain Baſſa ſent to the Port for ſupplies of men, and all that tooke pay of the Grand Seignior, euen to the old ſoldiers which were put to penſion, were ſent away, ſome to make gard at Chananchy by land, on the mouth of the Boſphorus; other by water to re-enforce the Armado, and all was filled with trouble and terrour. The feare of the Tartars likewiſe was not ſo extinguiſhed that there was not cauſe to expect ſome attempt by land, Shachi Gheray being in armes; and thoſe motions, if not ſuddenly appeaſed, would occaſion another breach with Poland. B C D

The Coſſacks returne to the Boſphorus.

The Plague at that time raged as if it would haue diſpeopled the city of Conſtantinople and the villages adiacent, and the Francke Nations did all feele it; but the Turkes and Iewes by Armies, as if they went to conquer hell, if there were no league and confederacie betweene them. On the three and twentieth of Iuly there was Corban or ſacrifice made at the gate of the Seraglio, two Beeues and a hundred Sheepe: at euery other port of the citie two Beeues and ſome Sheepe for the contagion and warre.

Ianet Ogli returned againe towards Smyrna, and the Chaya or Lieutenant of the Bey of the city, raiſing three thouſand ſouldiers, went out againſt him, hoping to draw more to follow him: They met at a plaine, and fought valiantly, Ianet Ogli remaining victor, with the death of the Chaia and two thouſand of his men: and he was dayly expected at Smyrna, hauing ſent before to aſſure the people that he would do no violence to any Trader or inhabitant, but onely renew the Oath of obedience to him, and puniſh ſome that were authors of this enterpriſe againſt him. The Merchant-ſtrangers were ſo confident in him, as they purpoſed not to ſtirre, but to receiue him as their Protector; and thought the Rebell an honeſter man than any Iuſtice of their Towne. The myſterie of this ſtrange courſe could ſcarce be penetrated, for he ſtil reported he had authoritie from the Grand Seignior; though it was denied at the Port, for they were glad to know how to quiet him. E

Ianet Ogli taken and ſlaine.

Yet not many dayes after, he fought a battell which he loſt, and was taken, being betrayed by his owne followers; and it was deſired that he might be brought aliue to be ſeene at the Port; but the Ianizaries crucified him, and ſent his and his mothers and his brethrens heads together, ſo that the tumor was ſuddenly allayed.

About the foure and twentieth of September the gallies returned from the Blacke-Sea, with the loſſe onely of foure by a great ſtorme. The Captaine Baſſa brought in triumph two hundred & ſeuentie poore Coſſacks, & was receiued as if Pompey had againe finiſhed the Piratique war, that almoſt famiſhed Rome: But they did not triumph at the victorie, but ouer the conquered people; and they eſteemed this ſea fight next to that of Lepanto; but the nobler for the eſcape: for doubtleſſe if the winde had not riſen too great for the frigots, which were F in number aboue foure hundred, the whole fleet had bin in danger to haue bin towed North- G wards euen into the iawes of the Enemie.

The great Defterdar strangled & thrown into the streets.

About the same time, the great Defterdar, Treasurer of that Empire, was sent for into the Kings gardens, and there by the Bustangi Bassa strangled and slung out in his shirt into the streets; an vsuall end of riches and greatnesse in that Court. Otherwise, the State of that empire did then produce no remarkeable alteration: for the iealousie of the Tartars was somewhat appeased; but the Termes with Poland were vncertaine, while the Cossackes were yet vnrestrained. The Grand Seigniour vsed all flatterie to the Tartar Han, to enter Poland in reuenge: Which he promised, and rode as farre as Akyrman; but from thence excused his not proceeding, vpon the waters: which was doubtfully interpreted, That hee had no will. In the meane time the King of Poland sent an Armie against the Cossackes, to shew his sin- H ceritie to the Peace; which was very well taken of the Turks.

The Persians ouerthrown by the Georgians, and the Bishop of Calcedon sent Embassador to them.

The Georgians in the meane time gaue a blow to the Persian, and sent many of their heads to the Port by a Nuntio; who was presently dispatched away with the Bishop of Calcedon, as Embassadour of the Grand Seignior, to enter league with those Princes, to make some diuersion. Abassa the old Rebell would not yet trust himselfe with the Vizier, but pretended he would vnite himselfe with the Georgians in the seruice of that State; although he fortified himselfe strongly, and discharged himselfe of his Ianizaries. The Grand Seignior to assure him, or to preuent that hee should not reuolt, sent him the dignitie of a Vizier, a Sword and a Vest, and authoritie to make warre in companie of the Georgians, in qualitie of a Generall (so well a strong Theefe prospered there:) and he arriued not long after with his I Army at * Mosul, a place recouered from the Persians in the way to Babylon: who vnderstanding of supply of eight thousand, sent thither by the Persian to re-inforce the garrison, sent out a party of Courds, that encountred and broke them, obtaining a full victorie with the fall of two thousand, and the General and two young Sultans taken prisoners; who were sent to the Port, with the heads of their followers. The newes of which ouerthrow was receiued with much ioy and content in the Court. The Vizier demanded a million and two hundred thousand Cheequines to be sent beforehand for foure moneths pay of the Army; giuing this reason, That foreseeing he must Winter in those parts, and that Babylon would be defended, it was necessarie to haue money to hold his souldiers together; for if hee should diuide them to their Hybernation, it would be August before they could be drawne into the K field, and the Spring lost: and to hold them that were alreadie almost in mutinie, were impossible, vpon credit. To this end all wayes were vsed to raise money; a third of which sum was sent from the Port, but the rest was hardly found (for the ordinarie charge far exceeded the reuenue) and fell very heauie vpon such as were forced to contribute.

* Ninive.

The Persian King, reported to be taken in his limbes at the same time (which did commonly forerunne some sudden enterprise) lay with his Armie about Tauris, indifferently to succour Babylon, and to attend the Circassians, or to make some diuersion when hee should see the Viziers Armie setled and ingaged in a siege: Which was not long deferred; for hee besieged Babylon, wherein were eight thousand Persians in defence. His regular army (consisting of Ianizaries and Spahies, directly payed from the Grand Seignior) were lodged on L
the one side; and the Beghs (which were thirteene) with the Timariots and Souldiers repartited on their gouernments on the other. As they began their approches, in a morning twentie thousand Persian horse fell into the Quarter of the Vizier, and did a great execution: but the alarme taken by the Beghs, they came to his rescue, and the Persians retyred. In that faction there fell fiue or six thousand Turkes. Whereupon afterward there was made a generall muster, and not found aboue foure thousand Ianizaries, of twelue thousand; nor ten thousand Spahies, of thirty thousand that were written for the warre: so that all the strength did rest in the Beghs, who were well followed, and little care or obedience in the other Orders. There were seuen Princes of the Arabs, who were subiects to the Grand Seignior, and ought to serue and aid him when they were commanded; but being summoned, they raised their M forces by common consent, and stayed vpon their owne borders; answering, They durst not displease the possessor of Babylon; but if the victorie did fall to one, they would yeeld their antient obedience vnto the Grand Seignior: and if the Persian did hold his recouered right, they

A they also would not longer acknowledge any superiour, being (as they pretended) borne of free Ancestors.

About the fiue and twentieth of March there fell a great storme vpon the Bailo of Venice, 1626. for an accidentall fight by a Venetian Vessell with a Bey of Andry: Many of the Turks were slaine, and the Captaine Bassa pretended great damages; auerring, That their galley was rich and rifled. He answered wisely and stoutly, That it was a chance; and would vnderstand of no composition, but only write to the Senate to examine the cause by iustice. But the Turks sought to draw an inference, That he, as Procurator of the Republique, was bound to stand in Law before the Iudges of the Port (where he was like enough to be heard and condemned B together) and then to remaine as a Pledge for satisfaction. But he would not yeeld so much aduantage; insisting, That he was an Embassadour, to expound the sence of his Prince, and to maintaine the Amitie: and so by his standing mute the businesse rested in discontent.

The Ianizaries mutine against the Bostangi Bassa.

The gouernment of the Turkish Empire dayly declined, and (as a great and strong Bodie) had violent luctations before it yeelded and wasted. The Ianizaries about the last of March mutined against the Bostangi Bassa, for beating one of their Order (for disorder in the night) by the Grand Seigniours command, and before his window. By their Canon, they ought to be deliuered to their owne Capes to be iudged and punished; yet, though the Emperours word should be aboue the Law of his Slaues, and though he auowed the fact, sent and wrote vnto them, nothing would appease them; onely his life they pardoned, exacting his displa-
C cing, with sentence of incapabilitie euer to beare office. He had been a good seruant to his Master, carefull of the publique Honour, seuere against the licentiousnesse of the times, and therefore vnfit for them. Afterward (following the example) they began to quarrell with the Vizier, who had fauoured the Bostangi; and with much labour they were silenced for a time, but not quieted. This was their estate: What could then strangers expect, when the Emperor suffered iniuries of his owne bondmen?

At the same time, an open rupture betweene the Grand Seigniour and the King of Poland was like to succeed an inuasion made a little before into Podolia by the Tartar Han; who returning from thence with a great prey, was met, and lost with a part of it, the greatest part of his Army. Whose brother Iean Geray refusing to accompanie the action, as contrarie to D the Peace and his Oath, sent the Generall Conessoloky the copy of the Order from the Port; which being discouered there, they hearkened after any ouerture or meanes to make vp the breach, and to procure a new reconciliation. But the ouerthrow giuen to the Tartars encouraged the Poles to declare their reuenge, and to auow the attempts of the Cossacks, who were then ready with seuen hundred frigots, to fall vpon some part neere Constantinople, munition being allowed them, and a Polish Captaine to euery boat. They threatened to fight with the Grand Seigniours Armado, and made a vow to inuest and carry away the Admirall Galley. All the villages on the Bosphorus to the gates of Constantinople trembled, and the city it selfe was not without feare; softened by certaine prophecies and Astrologians, who foretold a great blow from a Northerne people. Twentie gallies kept the mouth of the chan-
E nell, and the Captaine Bassa was to depart within ten dayes with forty more; almost alreadie conquered with his owne and the common feares.

The Grand Seigniours Army setled before Babylon.

Certaine newes was brought from Babylon, That the King of Persia had besieged the Viziers campe, and that he was lodged vpon his Trenches, and had cut off all accesse of prouision: so that the Grand Seigniours care was then greater to saue his Armie, than to recouer the Citie. Yet his Ministers did abate little of their pride, but were more readie to doe a wrong or any insolencie than euer; insensible of their owne estate, or dissembling it a peruerse way.

The King of Poland being yet very loth to breake the Peace with the Grand Seigniour, which had been concluded betweene them chiefely at the instance and mediation of his Ma-
F iestie of Great Britain; although the Tartars had entred his countries, and done great spoile, he caused his Minister to write to his Maiesties Embassadour at the Port, to lay downe their iust complaint: which the Embassadour did, in confidence of his friendship with the Chimacham; to whom he went directly, pressing him as well to a consideration of his Masters and his owne estate, as of that of the King of Poland; saying, That all the burthen and blame would

would finally light vpon him; it being the vsuall way of great Princes, to discharge their failings and errours vpon their Ministers. This admonition moued the Chimacham to much, and this was the substance of his answer:

In all Lawes and Religions (said he) there is nothing more odious than to be esteemed a Lyer; because Law and Religion presuppose truth, especially in great Ministers, vpon whose faith much of the publique quiet depended: but most especially at such a time (for then it was * Ramazan) separate to deuotion, that it was most abhominable to God to sweare a lye, by whome hee swore, and by the life of the King, all whose benefits might be poyson to him in his heart, if euer either he or his Master gaue any order or intimation to the Tartar Han to enter Poland, or to do any act contrarie to the Peace: which if he had done he might iustifie, seeing the Cossackes the yere before did make the first breach, and gaue the occasion. To witnesse this assertion he called the * Reitzkuta, who made no scruple, iurare in verba Magistri, to sweare to what his Master had said: finally he confessed there were Commands written to Mehemet Gheray, by intelligence and consent of the Polish Generall, to enter the countrey of the Cossacks on both sides, to reduce them to obedience; with restriction of any damage to be done to those comprehended in the Peace: and that whatsoeuer the Tartar Han had done more, was and should be disauowed, as beyond his Commission. Many other matters he repeated, as the remoue of Cante-Emir, and the death of Hagi Key, onely to auoid any occasion of their parts. And in conclusion, all his discourse tended to an expression of desire to maintaine a good and perfect Peace. His Maiesties Embassadour asked the Chimacham, what he was willing he should write in answer to the King of Polands Ministers? Who briefely answered, That they had no other intent but to keepe the late Treaty; and that if vpon the Poles part (as they had begun) the Cossackes should be restrained, they would take absolute order with the Tartars; who had no other pretence of quarrell, but a claime of a certaine pension (mentioned in the Treaty) vsually giuen them; which if his Maiesty of Poland would establish, there should neuer be more occasion of those mutuall laments: That it were a dishonour to the Grand Seignior, to seeke and entreat the comming of an Embassadour to settle those late disorders; but if the King of Poland pleased to send one, he should be receiued with all rites and respects. To this the English Embassadour replied, That he doubted some ill example of the vsage and detention of others, would make the Polacke warie, and difficult to engage any person of Qualitie. To which hee gaue all such assurance of good and free acceptation as words could expresse. All which, the Embassadour returned in writing to the Ministers of Poland; entreating both parties to conniue at what was past, and endeauour by all means afterward to restraine those mutuall incursions, which were begun anew by the Cossackes, the noyse of whom had strooke the Imperiall citie with great feare.

The Spahies cause the Chimacham to be strangled.

Vpon the third of Iuly the Spahies assembled in the Hippodrome; discontent with the gouernment of the old Chimacham Georgi Mehemet Bassa (the ablest and wisest man in that State, but to Christians malicious, and of the Poles a continuall persecuter) who had the authoritie of the great Vizier in his absence at the war; and in great furie ran to the house of the Mufti, and demanded of him to pronounce a sentence of death against him, and that he would rise and informe the Grand Seignior of their will; which if hee refused, they threatened a generall reuolt, and to do their owne iustice. There was no remedie; the Emperour being enformed, was pleased instantly to displace him, and to giue the office to Regeb Captaine Bassa, and his to * Imbraher Bassa; hoping thus to quiet all matters. But this gaue them no satisfaction, they demanded in greater furie his life. The poore old man was retyred into the Grand Seigniours protection, who vsed all meanes to appease them, offering to banish or confine him: but nothing would content and separat them vntil he had deliuered him vp; who the next day was strangled and throwne into the streets, where the Barbarians vented their spleene vpon his dead body, cutting off his eares and nose, and carrying them in triumph to their fellowes. Presently they demand the life of some others, principally of Morat Chiaus the Customer (odious to all men), whom when they could not finde they sacked his house. Within a day or two after, they began to be quiet, vpon promise, That if he could be found he should be rendred to them, and others to be brought in Iustice: but all feared that that Pestilence and Destruction of the city would escape by force of his money, hauing three times before been in the like danger. That great Minister the Chimacham was ninetie six

A six yeares old, had been forty fiue yeares Vizier, and thrice Chimacham. The great seruices he had done, euen to the preseruation of the Empire, nor any other respect could protect him from this rage. The occasion then taken against him, was, That he did conceale the ill estate of the Army in Babylon, flattering the Grand Seignior while their fellowes perished; and certaine Letters written in bloud, as from the Campe, produced to accuse him; which afterward were discouered to be written in Constantinople. When the sentence was deliuered to the Bostangi Bassa, he came to the lodging of the Chimacham in the Kings Garden, where he thought himselfe in sanctuarie, and for reuerence to his age and place; held it (being written) in his hand, rather to intimate, than to be the messenger. The poore old man perceiuing it, desired an houre to pray; and coniured him to warne the Grand Seigniour,
B hereafter not to be so easie to consent to shed innocent bloud, which within few dayes hee would repent: and lastly he entreated, that he might not die by the foule hands of the Hangman: which cost him deare; for the Bostangies executioners, either for respect, or for want of skill, could not finish his life (so great was his old heart) in one houre: hee was buried by a few Rascals, his owne seruants hid, and no man daring to accompany him to his last Bed.

The immediate foregoing discourse was filled with the iniustice and insolencie of man; but this bringeth with it examples of the iustice of God, who reuengeth the bloud of his enemies and wicked men, vniustly spilt, to preserue his image euen amongst them that studie to destroy it. To this may be fitly applied that boldnesse, Non esse curæ Deis securitatem eorum etiam vltionem: The Ianizaries either enuious that they had no part in the last sedition,
C or being innocent, vnwilling to participate in the infamie, or rather it was their turne to doe somewhat; forced the boats of the gallies which lay aboue Constantinople in the channell, and came downe to a garden house vpon the sea in the night, where the Emperour priuately reposed, and began to exclaim against the death of the Innocent; protesting they had no share therein, but as obedient slaues they desired the peace of the State, and that Iustice and quietnesse might returne to the City; and requiring reuenge vpon diuers whom they accused as the authors of those tumults, they named their owne * Segmen Bassa as the principall, and eighteene of their owne officers, and diuers others of the chiefe Spahies, who held councels together, and were become heads of Factions; which vntill they were all cut off, there was
D no hope of good gouernment and peace. The Grand Seignior gaue them milde words, and promised to do iustice, and to punish all such as should be found guilty: but nothing being don to satisfie them, and it being beleeued that the new Chimacham conniued, and had bin a partie to al their counsels, at least his preferment made him obnoxious to that suspition; and it was most true, that the Segmen Bassa & his followers & faction were the contriuers of the tal and murther of Georgi Mehemet Bassa, and very probable that he was fauoured if not prompted by the new Minister; the Ianizaries rose againe, and by force brought downe the gallies neere the city, and landed and held a Councell very secret in their chambers. This bred much suspition and feare; but the day of publique audience being come, according to the E custome, they repaired all to the Seraglio, and waited in their order: their Segmen Bassa only did not appeare; and it was thought he absented purposely by agreement with the Chimacham, lest there should be some occasion to examine the past businesse, which would not endure the light. The * Diuan being finished, and the Viziers and * Cadder-Lesehers comming toward the gate, they were stopped by the Ianizaries, and told plainly they would speake with the King. Such persuasions as were requisite were vsed; but there was no remedie, they would deliuer their owne message. The young Emperour at first was afraid, and retyred; but to auoid greater inconueniences, resolued to come out to them. Order was instantly giuen to send for the Mufti and the Antients of the Law, and many Santons, for the Segmen Bassa, and others of qualitie to be present at this action. In the meane F Throne was brought out, and placed in the great Court, and the Grand Seignior came forth and sate in his Maiestie, attended and assisted by all the great Ministers and officers of his empire, to strike a reuerence and feare into the souldiers, whose purposes were not discouered. Contrarie to all expectation, an Elect o spake for them: In all humble manner professing their obedience, and lamenting the sickenesse of the State, and those late tumults, and declaring as they were not guilty of this last mutinie, so they were read [illegible] of their

Prince, and for the reformation of those disorders, to which there could be applied no remedie but by A the sword of Iustice to cut off all those heads which held Conuenticles, and plotted dayly alterations, onely to gouerne the whole Empire at their will. They desired their Petition might be accepted, and those disturbers of the peace sought out and executed, in which they would assist: and that new names and titles might be forbidden, which many had taken vp as Heads of Factions; and the Souldierie reduced to their antient discipline: Which if his Maiestie would grant, and speedily put in practise, they were ready to die in his seruice; otherwise, as there was no hope of quietnesse, so they did foresee greater mischiefes dayly contemplated, which they would oppose as well as they were able. At the end of this Oration (which might haue become a Cato) they deliuered a briefe petition in writing, wherein they modestly accused the new Chimacham of confederacie and conniuence with their Segmen Bassa, whom they anew appealed, and gaue vp th[illegible]mes of those H their owne Officers, and Spahies, vpon whom they layd all the burthen of the dayly tumults.
The Emperour gaue them a short but satisfactorie answer; yeelding to their request, yet mingled with some admonition such as became a Prince: and so they departed euery man to their owne rest. But the Segmen Bassa hauing some intimation that his name was renewed in that list of death, tooke the first opportunitie, fled, and hid himselfe; and diuers others, conscious of their owne merits, retyred, and thereby condemned themselues: not one roaring Spahi to be seene in the city; all things were so calme as if Astræa were descended. There was no distemper but in the heart of the Chimachim, who was afraid to bring his complices into triall, and yet was sure if they were not taken, the escape would be his ruine: for the Ianizaries exacted of him an account of the execution. With much diligence the Seg- I men Bassa was apprehended and brought to the Court. He was first examined, rather to find his owne treasure which was infinite (for he had the spoyle of Greece in the last gathering of tribute-children; and of the Seraglio at the death of Sultan Osman) than to discouer other men. The Grand Seigniour sent for him, and after few words, gaue sentence to haue his head strucken off, which was instantly performed before the dore. Afterwards diuers of both Orders were taken (as was reported, to the number of twenty two) priuately strangled and throwne into the sea; and some (principally branded) were hidden and fled. This trouble turned the Grand Seigniour to account many wayes; for by confiscations he aduanced a million and two hundred and fiftie thousand dollars of the Segmen Bassa; by the Scriuano as much; by others, very great summes; and, as if peace had risen out of the graue of the old K Chimacham, there was heard no more noyse: the Spahies shrunke, and the Ianizaries as their glory tooke vpon them an austere reformation. But there were many inward sores and discon-tents, which notwithstanding all this cleere aire, were like to breake out, and one day could not be sufficient to cure or purge the corruptions of that State.

The Grand Seigniours Army in di-stresse.

While the Grand Seigniour was thus troubled with appeasing his disordered and mutinous Ministers and Slaues at home, newes was brought from Babylon, That his campe there was in great extremitie, besieged without by the Persian, Master of the field, and consequently of their prouisions; nakednesse, famine, and diseases, within, were more terrible than the Enemy; and the supplies sent, stayed at Dierbeker, not daring to proceed without better gards: insomuch as if speedy succours were not giuen them, the army must dishonourably L and dangerously breake and steale away. But hereupon there was a publique Councel held, in which all Orders as well ciuile as militarie assisted; and a present supply collected, and a Generall chosen to conduct them.

The Grand Seigniour, because the greatest part of his land forces were thus busied and employed against the Persian in Asia, sent his Letters (at the instance of the Prince of Transyluania) to diuers Kings and Princes vnited for the liberty of Germany, to encourage them to perseuerance and constancie in such designes as were fit for that purpose. But this was an art of Gabor, to insinuate (by this shew) into the Grand Seignior an opinion of great confederacie with those Princes, to make himselfe more valued and considerable at the Port; and on the other side to improue his authoritie in Christendome, by the pretence of so much cre- M dit, and so great aids ready for his seruice. The copy whereof doth here immediately follow.

Prince

Prince Morat euer Victorious;

TO the most glorious amongst the great Lords of Iesus, and chiefe amongst the highest of the people of Messiah, Directors of all the affaires of Christians, Princes of the limits of power and honour, Lords who direct to greatnesse and glorie, and Kings ouer many Nations, who an-tiently haue declared themselues to beare true loue and affection to our high Port: and to all Kings and Princes, glorious Potentates, and other Gouernours of the people of Iesus, whose last dayes wee pray God may euer be happy: but especially to those who haue at the present desired the friendship B of our most happy Port, the sanctuarie and refuge of the Cæsars and Princes of our age. To them let it be knowne, vpon the sight of our most high and Imperiall Signature, That there is arriued at our happy Port, a messenger with a Letter from the most glorious amongst the followers of Iesus, and the most respected and honoured amongst the people of the Messiah, Director of the affaires of the Nazaren people, Patron of the limits of honour and power, and Lord of greatnesse and glory, Bethlem Gabor, Gouernor of Transyluania, and King of Hungarie, whose last dayes be propitious; beeing a true seruant and an vndoubted friend to our high Port, by the great mercie of the most high God euer preserued; and by the wonderfull protection of the chiefe of Prophets our Prophet Mahomet Mustapha (whom God blesse) kept safe, with a most noble, high, and continued off-spring:
which did signifie, That some of you who in those parts be Kings and great Gouernours, and chiefest C and most glorious of the honoured and famous amongst the Lords that are obedient to the Messiah haue attentiuely shewed your selues constant and firme in your affection and sincere goodwil to our high Port; and that some others of you, being Lords of great Countries, do now desire friendship and acquaintance with our Imperiall Maiestie; and that the Gouernor of Transyluania and King of Hungarie, holdeth at the present good friendship and correspondence with you, and that you haue united your selues with him for good and honorable ends: who letteth vs vnderstand, That you haue sent Messengers and Letters to him; certifying him, That although some of you were antient and vn-doubted friends long before of our high Port; yet others of you who haue beene more remote, doe now desire to approch our familiaritie; and that he should be the guide and presenter of the sincere Faith and good affection which you pretend to haue with vs. And the said Bethlem Gabor King of Hun- D garie, in obseruance of the perfect obedience and loue to our happy Port, hath enformed vs of the truth of your state, and your offered friendship. Which his Letter, with all the particulars therein contained, we haue caused to be translated by our Viziers, and presented to our Imperiall view; so that nothing therein hath been hidden or vnknown to vs from the beginning to the end: the particulars whereof hath pleased our happy eyes, and the friendship which you haue desired to make with our high Port, hath been accepted of our Imperiall Maiestie: and all those things he certified there are most acceptable to our sincere minde; assuring you, That our high Port hath and shall be at all times open to the whole world, but especially to those who by a fresh and new friendship seeke to enter in and receiue it. And as all our Progenitors, and we our Selfe, to all the Friends of our house haue beene euer benigne and courteous, so to you shall be shewed all honour from our Imperiall Dignitie, and more E fauour than to others who are your equals. And in token that you may know we do accept of your loue and friendship offered, we giue you safe conduct to send your Embassadours into our high Court; writing this our Letter vnto you, full of all affection and integritie. At the arriuall whereof it is meet, that in conformity of the good affection and sincere friendship which you haue promised in presse to our high Port, you vse all diligence and care to fulfill and prosecute this worthy and good businesse which you haue begun, hauing your mindes attentiue and setled vpon the same, in such sort as they be stable and sure, according to antient custome in like cases. And to other Kings friends of this Port, you shall send your Embassadours of Honour, that the meanes of loue and friendship may encrease euery day; and the good effects vpon our part shall be dayly augmented, and the bonds of our affection shall go forward and continue: and by the grace of the high God, your Embassadours or F other Ministers comming to our happy Port, shall haue assigned them euery one apart their house, and according to the forme and manner of our Imperiall Maiestie shall be entertained and vsed: and and when it shall be fit for them to returne to you again, we will take order for their more commodious and safe passage. Therefore rest satisfied in minde, and giue credit to all things and lines set downe concerning this affaire: and be you also firme and [illegible] ſpondence and confederacie. And we haue ſent to Mahemet Baſſa our Vizier, &c. (whoſe glorie God continue) who at the preſent is Gouernour of Buda our expreſſe Commands, and giuen order, That all the Armies belonging to him, of Buda, Boſnia, Temeſuar, Canſia, and Agria, and other places adioyning thereunto: and beſides them, to the moſt eminent Beglerbeghs of the Prouince of Greece (whoſe Armies belong vnto him) the moſt valiant Captaines of all our Empire; and to other perſonages of eminent ranke, who haue vnder their command many thouſands of men; That they repaire to our ſaid Vizier and Generall, (whoſe glory God encreaſe) and being all gathered together, that they make their Muſters and Campe at the confines neere Buda, in ſuch a place and part as ſhall be fit for that purpoſe. And on the other ſide alſo, That Bethlem Gabor (Gouernour of Tranſyluania, and King of Hungarie, ſhall leuie a good Armie, and keepe good correſpondence with our ſaid Vizier, that they may be in readineſſe and prepared, in caſe that any Enemy inuade the ſaid King of Hungarie, or the Prouince of Tranſyluania; that then they vſe all their diligence and readineſſe to repell them, and fulfill all theſe duties which concerne the honour of our State, and are beſeeming the reputation of our Religion. And by the grace of God, after that your Embaſſadours (honourable and fit perſonages) ſhall come here with your Letters, and eſtabliſh a good Peace and friendſhip, there ſhall be no doubt but you and your Countries and Allyes ſhall be protected by vs, and hereafter comprehended in all our Treaties of Peace which we ſhall conclude and eſtabliſh. In concluſion, All that which our noble minde can expreſſe or promiſe, ſhall be effected: whereof we haue giuen notice at large to all our Miniſters. Of euery other particular the Gouernour of Tranſyluania and King of Hungarie will write to you more amply; to whom I deſire you to giue faith and credit; and to obſerue good correſpondence both with him and our ſaid Vizier Muhemet Baſſa of Buda: and you ſhall write vnto vs (when this our Imperiall Letter ſhall come to your hands) of what other thing ſhall happen, by your Embaſſadours; which by the grace of God you ſhall ſend to our high Port: and you ſhall be very carefull alwaies to fulfill the beginnings of this our friendſhip and Amitie.

Written in the middle of the moneth of Iuly, 1626. in Conſtantinople.

About this time there arriued a Letter from the King of Great Britaine to the Grand Seigniour, concerning the Treaty of Algier and Tunes; and complaining of diuers iniuries done vnto his ſubiects, and requiring Iuſtice and redreſſe: which being reſpectiuely anſwered, are worthy of publique communication.

His Maieſties Letter to the Grand Seigniour.

CHARLES by the grace of the moſt high God, King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Chriſtian Faith, &c. To the high and mightie Emperor Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Muſſulman Kingdome, ſole and ſupreme Monarch of the Eaſterne Empire, ſendeth greeting.

WE haue vnderſtood by our Embaſſadour reſident with you, with how much honour and reſpect the death of our deere Lord and Father of euer glorious memorie was condoled at your Imperiall Port; And if the ſignification thereof, and of our peaceable ſucceſſion to theſe Crownes, haue not in all this time come vnto you immediately from our Selfe, it hath not been through any default of our affection, or reſpect to you, but many important affaires vpon our firſt acceſſe, and the dangerous infection wherewith our Royal M city of London, and many other principall parts of our Kingdome haue been viſited, haue diuerted vs, and forced vs to defer theſe offices longer than we intended or deſired. And as we hope you will for theſe important reaſons, readily & freely excuſe thoſe omiſſions which in

And to giue you the better proofe of our reall and ſincere intentions therein, we haue ratified and do ratifie the Treaty made by our Embaſſadour Sir* Thomas Roe in that your Imperiall Port, with your Subiects of Algier and Tunes; and we cannot doubt, but that you for your part will keepe a conſtancie in the exact performance thereof, and to that end

We do likewiſe recommend vnto you, and pray you, in conformitie to our deſire of friendſhip and good correſpondencie, to confirme and ratifie thoſe priuiledges which haue been formerly granted by your Predeceſſors, to our Merchants, and to enlarge the ſame according to preſent occaſions, and as ſhall be moſt conuenient for the good of both our Kingdomes: which as we will ſtudy by all good meanes to keepe vp in full force, and moſt aduantageous execution; ſo we may not*
C omit to repreſent vnto you the grieuances of our Subiects, when they are vniuſtly wronged, contrarie to the Capitulations betweene vs, and we preſume without your knowledge or conſent. That which we haue now to deſire your Iuſtice in, is, Firſt, Extreame iniuries done by inferior Officers, and ſpecially by one Morat Chaus a Cuſtomer of that Port, who hath not onely broken, but alſo ſcorned and contemned the Articles of the Capitulation, and that in the publique Diuan, to your diſhonour, and to the great preiudice of our Merchants. Secondly, an open iniuſtice done to our ſubiects in Algier, where the Engliſh Conſul and the reſt of the Nation were reſtrained of their libertie, their goods ſeiſed vpon, and forced to pay great ſummes of money, contrarie to Iuſtice and the direct termes of the Treaty. But if while we on our behalfe do obſerue the Capitulation and all good termes of

We do*
E further particularly pray you to giue expreſſe order for the vpholding and maintaining that Article of priuiledge for the paying but only of one Cuſtome within all the Ports vnder your Iuriſdiction, with free libertie to export any commoditie, hauing once payd cuſtome, without further charge; and that our ſubiects be not exacted vpon contrary to that priuiledge. The further particulars of our ſubiects grieuances, and what elſe we deſire to be negotiated with you, we haue giuen in charge to our Embaſſador Sir Thomas Roe, to whom we pray you to giue credit, and to returne vs full anſwers to the ſeuerall points of this our Letter
F Wherein if you ſhall giue reliefe to our ſubiects, and puniſh thoſe that violate the Capitulation, we ſhall receiue it as a ſingular teſtimony of your iuſtice, your good intentions [illegible] vs, your conſtancie in your Contracts, and your iudgement in what [illegible] relation to the good of your owne Dominions, and we ſhall be readie to anſwer that readie [illegible] yours, [illegible] uer may reſt on our part to performe. Dated the firſt of March, 162[illegible]

The Grand Seigniours Answer to his Maiesties Letter of Great Britaine.

Prince Morat, euer successefull;

TO the mighty Prince, reuerend among the Maiesties of the Princes of the Law of Iesus, obeyed of the great Potentates followers of the Messia the on[ly] director of the important affaires of the Nazaren People, Soueraigne of the lim[its] of Honour and Power, the most glorious CHARLES, King of Great Britaine: To whose last dayes we wish all felicity.

TO the sublime and happy Throne of our high Port, the Seat of the perpetuall Vicariat, the which by the mercy of the Diuine Maiestie of the mighty God, and by the grace of the Lord was the Seale of the Prophets, vpon whom be continuall blessing, and th[e] refuge of the Princes vpon the face of the earth, and the Sanctuarie of the Potentates of th[e] world; your Letter with accustomed sinceritie is arriued, by the hands of your Embassador, the e[steemed] among the Nation of Messiah, Sr Thomas Roe, resident in our happy Port, to whose ena[rra]ve wish blessednesse. Th[e] which, according to the antient Ottoman custome, and the vsed Imperiall forme, was by our supreme Vizier and glorious Vicegerent translated and expounded, and being presented before our State of most ample honour and felicitie, and seene by our Imperiall eyes, and considered in our benigne sight, from the beginning to the end, our noble vnderstanding hath entirely conceiued the inserted businesse, and all particulars thereof; and our discreet aspection, from the least to the greatest, hath comprehended all your proposed affaires, all which conduce to loue. The principall whereof is (besides that you haue fully mentioned, and declared the state of the Amitie that betweene both Dominions hath beene preserued by your Fathers and Ancestors) That now your Maiestie, after your Father of glorious memorie, being by iust inheritance ascended to the Regalitie of those Crownes, doth aduise vs, That you also, more than your Father, are stable and firme in the same way of friendship, and most constant toward vs, in preseruation of the Peace and good correspondence, and daily attentiue to endeauor the strengthening of the Peace and Amitie with our Port, and resolued to accomplish the same, and not to faile in any part of louing correspondence. With which your friendly aduice, with most sincere words expressed, and to vs most gratefull; That you in a blessed houre, and a happy time, haue possessed, and begun to raigne in the Kingdomes of your Father; the secret of our purest heart was greatly reioyced, and did conceiue abundance of contentment, and our Imperiall Maiesty also hath therefore obtained, and together expressed all manner of gladnesse and loue toward your Maiesty, in diuining you all happinesse.

You haue also aduised vs, That your aboue named Embassador, yet abiding in our blessed Port, hauing formerly treated with those of Tunes and Algier, and contracted concerning your Merchants, and their free traffique and commerce in those parts, and conformably with them agreed, concluded, and confirmed the Peace; the which being very profitable and commodious to both our Kingdomes, that you haue also ratified, and in the whole condescended thereunto; desiring, That on our behalfe also the same should be obserued: and to the end that for euer hereafter there may be no deuiation from the same Accord, and that to the Merchants, according to the antient custome, going and comming to those parts to traffique and negotiate contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulation, no iniurie may be by them done, That we should send to our Vice-Kings our expresse Commands. Therefore you shall know, That we haue alreadie sent to our said Vice-Royes, with expresse order, our most efficacious and Imperiall Commandements, and strictly charged them, Neuer to transgresse the same contracted Agreement; and that they take heed, Not to do any wrong or violence to any of your Merchants (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) trading and vsi[ng] those parts.

And furthermore, hauing signified vnto vs, That certaine Magistrates and Customers of some Scales of our well defended Empire, contrarie to the Articles and Couenants written in the Imperiall Capitulations, do make diuers demands of grieuances and impositions of your Merchants, and vnder vnder the name of Mesteria,* and such like, do pretend and exact money from them: and hauing also aduised vs, That conformable to the Imperiall Capitulation, your Merchants hauing payd their due custome; and transporting their goods to other Scales, that they also demand of them a new Custome: Therefore it being in no wise our Imperiall will that in our prosperous dayes; and iust and peacefull raigne, contrary to our Imperiall Capitulation, that wrong should be done to any man; We haue giuen vpon this particular, our requisite and sufficient Imperiall Command; and straitly commanded and ordained, That they shall neuer transgresse our Imperiall Capitulation; and that the Nation of your Merchants, in what place or Scale soeuer they shall go; That the Magistrats and Customers do all diligence, that the said Merchants may liue quietly, contentedly, and securely; and hauing payed in one Scale the custome of any merchandise, which being not sold, and that they shall transport it to any other Scale, that they take great heed, not to demand nor take of them any new custome, nor euer, contrary to the Canon, to exact of them any new imposition or other grieuance.

* Customs.

You haue also further aduised vs, That the late Hussreph Bassa, while he remained in the charge of Vice-King of Algier, did vniustly take your Consul, resident in Algier, with the Merchants which liued with him, and hauing imprisoned them contrary to the Law, Iustice, and the friendship betweene vs, did take from them certaine thousands of dollars, and had done to them other great wrong and damage: Therefore, seeing it is more cleere than the Sunne-shine day, that it is not in any sort by our consent, that such iniustice and insolent actions should be committed, and there being then present in our happy Port some of the principall persons of the garrison of that place of Algier, who did know the whole proceeding, and wee hauing commanded they should bee examined of that businesse, they were presently brought to Iustice, and being all of them variously reprehended and affrighted, they did answer, confessing and obliging themselues, That all the money taken they would repay from the reuenue of the Custome, and Fists collected; and as soone as they should arriue in Algier, they would take order that the Consul and all the Merchants should be set free. In conformitie whereof, we also haue written our most effectuall and noble Command, reprehensiue and threatning, directed to the Vize-Re of Algier, & commanded him, That in this businesse he vse no negligence, but that without further delay he set at libertie the said Consul and Merchants, and restore vnto them entirely all their goods taken from them, and that he know, that hereafter no such action shall be pardoned; and that your Consul sent into those parts, according to antient custome, shall be entertained and honoured, and that he do punctually obserue and execute the due termes of friendship.

And in the conclusion, concerning all the included particulars of your letter, in due forme, and befitting our Maiesty the Fountaine of Iustice, and conformable to the Tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, there haue been written diuers our noble Commandements, and consigned to the hands of your said Embassadour; and for the time to come, in all things which shall lead to the encrease of our friendship, and those offices, commodious and profitable to the Merchants of both our dominions our Imperiall study and attention shall not be spared: and be you assured, that the termes of our Amitie and good correspondence which to this day hath beene continued, shall be of vs with excellent endeauour maintained.

But being informed from our honorable Gouernor, wise Councellor & Vizier Hayder Bassa (splendor God preserue) whom we haue assigned and sent to the custodie of the [illegible] there is come a petition, with a representation and attestation of the principall of [illegible] our happy Port, declaring, That in times past, in the gouernment of our Fezeli Bassa, [illegible] dead, being that certaine men of warre appertaining to your Kingdomes, had [illegible] lations, assailed the Merchants which with their goods returned from [illegible] their ships, and it being made knowne to the said Fezeli Bassa, that our [illegible] ged to the value of six hundred thousand Dollars: which action hein[g] [illegible] stice, and our Imperiall Capitulation, and that it was requisite the [illegible] ned, the said Fezeli Bassa did collect from the Masters of the [illegible] taken from our Merchants, an hundred thousand [illegible] whereas there was yet remaining to them [illegible] satisfied, the said men of warre [illegible] from your Country, and haue [illegible] sailing to the Scale of Ayman, [illegible] predation of all their [illegible]

many reasons, arguments, and accusations; but in the conclusion restrained, That if they saw G no probabilitie to obtaine and assure the Peace, that then Rerill should proceed to prouoke the Cossackes, and this Gentleman should not appeare in the Negotiation, but reside in the house of the Emperours Agent, vnder the name of his Secretarie, vntill further direction.

When these Propositions were first moued, the spacious shew made them acceptable: but when the particulars were weighed, especially that offer, To keepe the sea and coasts of the Mediterran free from any spoyle or inuasion; the Vizier moued a question, Whether the King of Spaine were soueraigne Lord of the Duke of Florence and the Grand Master of Malta? and if not, How he could command them, or restraine the Knights of Saint Stephano and Malta, who were Religious Orders, and sworne enemies to the Port? To this obiection re-ceiuing no cleere and satisfactorie answer, the Vizier began to mistrust, and to demurre. But H delayes (which are vsuall in that Court) nor suting with the account which this Bolognese was bound to render to the Duke of Ossuna, of his successe, Either to assure a Peace, or not to lose the opportunitie of a diuersion by the Cossackes; caused him to attempt both at once, and to employ Padre Berill to execute his part: Who being taken in Silistra on suspiti-on, by the Bassa Diach-Mehemet, and his Letters opened, the Spanish friendship was discouered; and the Bolognese stole himselfe out of the Countrey, and as it was reported, was at his returne imprisoned, for the vanitie of entituling himselfe as a publique Minister, and venting his Masters name in so great a Theatre. And the Agent of Cæsar assisted to accuse him; who not able to containe him within the limits of his Commission, but that he would breake out, and dispute that he ought personally, in the name of the Vice-Re to treat with the I Vizier; threatening to cause his pension from Spaine to be retrenched, as cold in the seruice of that Crowne; the ciuile strife proceeded from heat to blowes: and it was beleeued, That the Agent vnder-hand both haftened his flight, and procured his punishment.

The ill and disgracefull successe of this attempt, and the dissention betweene Ministers so strictly obliged by common ends, made many men beleeue, that the wise state of Spain would not againe rashly and suddenly engage their reputation to a second scorne. But Feare and Ne-cessitie, that obey no rules, enforced as it seemes the Vice-King of Naples (for all these practises were masqued vnder his name) to doe a seruice that would be most acceptable when it was done. For the rumour, That the Prince of Transyluania did prepare an armie, and that the Grand Seigniour had giuen order to the frontier Bassa's to assist him; and that the K Count of Mansfelt, and Duke Weymar were expected with their troupes to ioyne with him; this collegation appeared terrible, and to threaten Vienna it selfe: and therefore it was iudged the best counsell, openly to offer a Peace, to amuse or separate the Force of the Turke, or vnder the shadow of a Treaty, to steale away the first opportunitie of action. So that contra-1626. rie to all expectation, suddenly in Aprill of this yere, it was aduised from Ragusa, That there was there arriued in a Galliot of Naples, another Mercury, a Spanish Gentleman, that openly auowed himselfe to be directly sent from the Vice-Re, to offer a Peace to the Grand Seigniour, and to prepare the acceptance of Embassadours or Commissioners fit to treat it. Hee was well attended, and furnished with exchange, and earnestly recommended from the Vice-King to the Senate of that City. At his first landing he made grauitie, and expected some L ceremonies and reception: but those small States, who are like a graine betweene two mill-stones, thinking their greatest safety consisted in taking no notice, and in being on both sides disinteressed, would not vnderstand him; and he finding himselfe deceiued, was carried in a close chaire to the Monasterie of the Friar-Minors, and kept himselfe priuate; onely sending another Letter (which was written to a Vizier at the Port) to those Magistrates, desiring them to dispeed it by Post to Constantinople, and to prouide him guides for his journey thither: both which were done, and two Turkes appointed to conduct him. Before his departure, he dispatched another Currier to Belgrade to a Correspondent there. It was likewise aduised from Ragusa, That he was laden with Presents, and had order to spend freely: which M was dangerous in a Court where all things were vendible: and those that fauoured the designe, triumphed, and accounted the prize alreadie wonne, nothing being more discoursed than the Peace betweene Spaine and Turky. As a forerunner of this negotiation, to smooth the wayes, there was spred some weekes before this newes, a Letter printed in Spaine, Cum Licentia, as written from the Grand Seigniour to the Catholique King; offering Peace, and promising

A promising to separate from all his Enemies, and to leaue them to iust punishment, and neuer to assist or support them; with a Catalogue ioyned, of an infinite Present that should be sent by the Turke, to procure the acceptance of this Amitie. At the first sight this Letter was despised as a fiction; onely some contemplatiue men did make construction, That it was spread to encourage the people of Hungarie, and to remoue the feares of the Turke, or to raise a jealousie in Gabor and his Friends; especially being seconded with a concurrent rumour, That a Minister really was sent to treat Peace, and an Embassadour expected to follow him, that at least he should be receiued to gaine time. But these were poore shifts for for so great and wise a State: yet whatsoeuer the purpose was, whether it was a counterfeit, or directed to some end, it was taken vp and vsed as an instrument to reiect the Embassage, and to prohibit B the Bearer to approch the Court: For whether it fell into the hand of a Moore-Franke expelled Spain, or were made vse of by any that desired to crosse the conclusion of such a Peace, in such a coniuncture, so dangerous to many Princes and States, it was shewed the great Vizier, and Mufti, commented vpon, and vrged as a great affront to the Grand Seigniour. At which they tooke so high and sudden disdaine, that they gaue instant Commands, and sent horsemen to beat the wayes, with Commission to all the Beghs and Caddees to assist them, That whersoeuer they did meet or finde this Gentleman, that they should carry him directly backe to the sea side, and see him shipt; with admonition, Not to presume to land on penaltie of death. And others to checke the Senate of Ragusa, for re-ceiuing any Minister of their enemie, without asking leaue or consulting the State.

C The Gentleman was by this time aduanced foure dayes iourney toward the Port, where he fell and brake his leg, and was carried backe in miserable paine to Ragusa, and returned to his old lodging. Where the horsemen found him, and deliuering their Letters to the Senat, demanded to haue him giuen vp into their hands. But they refused to breake their Sanctuarie, and only promised to obey the effect of the Grand Seigniors Command, ciuilly to ship him, and to send him backe to Naples. Which was done in the presence of those Turks, and letters written by the Senat, both to the Vice-King & the Vizier, to excuse themselues, That they durst displease neither party, but desired to liue in the grace of both Princes.

The Grand Seigniours Command to all the Sanzackes and Caddees of Greece, to returne the Spanish Gentleman sent from the Vice-Re of Naples.

VPon the sight of this our Imperiall Signature, you shall take notice, That the Spaniards (being alwayes antient Enemies of our happy Port, the Fountaine of Felicity) haue of late sought to aduantage themselues of some Princes which keepe good E friendship and correspondence with vs: To which end the Vice-Roy of Naples did send the last yeare a Messenger to our Imperiall Port; intimating, That the King of Spaine was desirous of a Peace with vs: But in regard they haue euer beene our Enemies, and that the Peace which they did then offer was fraudulent, and onely to serue their owne ends; wee did not vouchsafe to giue him audience, but rather reiected both himselfe and his message.
And now againe we haue notice giuen vs, That there are others come to Ragusa, from the said King of Spaine, about the same businesse, with intent to come forward to our happie Port: Therefore we haue sent Mustapha our Capigi with our Imperiall Command, That F if any such like persons shall come within any of your seuerall Iurisdictions, That you stay them, and without one houre or moment of delay deliuer them to him, to be carried forth of our Dominions, and made returne to their owne Countrey. This is a businesse of very great importance, and therefore we command you to be very warie and circumspect in searching out for such persons, and that you vse no negligence or delay therein, but speedily obey and G put in execution this our Imperiall Command, not suffering any one whatsoeuer, comming either from the Vice-King of Naples, or the King of Spaine, to proceed forward toward our happy Port. And you shall certifie vs in writing, by the said Capigi, how and in what manner you haue executed our Command. And if any such persons comming from the Vice-King of Naples, or King of Spaine, haue any Letters or writings, you shall take them from them, and send them to our happy Port. And after you shall haue seene and vnderstood this our Command, you shall giue faith and credit to it, and restore it againe to our Slaue Mustapha Capigi.

Another of the same Tenour was sent by the same Messenger to the Commonwealth of Ragusa.

The Princesse of Transyluania elected to succeed the Prince in that Prouince.

About the sixth of September, the Prince of Transyluania sent a Post in great expedition to the Port, with Letters and Instructions to his Agent there, the substance whereof was reduced to two heads; First, to declare to the Grand Seignior, That his Estates in their Dyet, I by his consent, had elected his Lady to the succession of that Principalitie: and to require the confirmation, according to the antient Rites and Capitulations betweene them. For his sudden resolution, without consulting the Grand Seigniour, and in excuse of the sex, he proposed many reasons, all directed to one scope: That the encrease of the House of Austria was so dangerous to all Germany, that it was requisite to prouide for Transyluania, to preuent the corruptions of an Inter Regnum, wherein the Imperials might worke distemper and diuision: and therefore it was necessarie that a Successour should be declared, and in possession; and one well allyed and strengthened by the Princes opposite to the Austrians; which conditions meeting in his wife, made her without all exception. That this election was passed with the consent and in contemplation of his Allyes and friends of the Port, and vnder their assurance of protection. And that therefore he should vrge the Grand Seignior to concurre and to approue his care, employed onely to preuent and humble the Common Enemie. Secondly, That whereas then six yeares past, when he liued in peace, without offence of the Emperour, he had beene commanded by the Grand Seignior to moue his Armes, and to prouoke an Enemie, now become irreconcileable: Which Councell had been continued vntill that time, by the most experienced Ministers of the Turkish Empire; and Letters sent him the yeare before of the same tenour; and that he had lately required a plaine approbation of his prosecution of those designes, which being formerly indifferent, were now become necessary: And to persuade them, not to lose this opportunitie of confining the Emperour for euer within Germany, and setling an assured peace and safety to the Turkish frontier; that was by his conquest of Hungary. That if he found any difficultie in either of these, L That the succession were refused to his Lady, or succours to him to prosecute the war; that he should vnmaske, and plainely protest, That he had been engaged first by the Grand Seigniour, and made confederation with many friends, with his consent and approbation, too late to be reuoked, and his owne honour so farre thereby exposed, that he could not retire, but would prouide for his owne safety. Therefore, as he would pay his tribute, and continue his faith; so, if they would leaue him to himselfe, they must not disdaine the like measure in their occasions, from him and his Friends.

His Letters and messages were roundly deliuered to the Ministers of the Grand Seignior; and a generall answer giuen, That for the succession they would consult and resolue to his fit M satisfaction; and that a Letter should be presently written to approue the antient Councels. The Agent not content with that coldnesse, nor well discerning the times, pressed the Vizier to a more direct and particular answer.

But in the instant there arriued newes from Babylon, That the Campe was risen and fled, by

A by the fauour of the night, forced to burne their Tents and prouisions, and to breake their great Artillerie, and cast it into the Euphrates; That the miseries in the Army had been such as men in the field neuer suffered (consumed by famin, and suffocated by heat: by this, twelue thousand died in one day; the other might be iudged by the price of a bushell of barly, sold for thirty eight checquines of gold.) That the Great Vizier had beheaded three of the most valiant Bassa's, hoping thereby to cast the enuy of his shame vpon them: and, That retyring to * Mosul, the Persian vsed his victorie, and following a flying Army, did continuall execution for ten dayes vpon the Reare. So great a blow the Turkish Empire neuer receiued; the newes whereof was taken with so much sadnesse, that it was no season to treat of making new warres. The Emperours Agent made vse of this deiection, and opposed all the B Transyluanian negotiations diametrally, and promised the present comming of a great Embassadour to ratifie the Peace betweene the Grand Seigniour and his Master. And the Turks knew not whom to beleeue, weakened in spirit by their successe and the present constitution; Fluuri ambiguus, & magis quid vitaret quàm cui fideret certus; doubtfull of the future, and rather certaine what to auoyd, than whom to trust. Wherefore the Prince of Transyluania's Agent resolued, not to prouoke by an importune pressure, a dispairefull answer; but to giue them time to recollect ad gather heart, and to accept of their generall Letters, with a promise from the Chimacham annexed, That as soone as a few days of consultation and prouision for their affaires in Asia were past, that he would enter into a particular consideration of his Master, and giue him ample content in them; and that in the mean time he might proC ceed cheerefully.

 Niniue.*

The Bassa of Buda in the meane time sent a Post to the Port, with certaine newes of the arriuall of the Duke of Weymar and Count Mansfelt in Silesia; and that the Prince of Transyluania was risen to ioyne with them, hauing mutually exchanged and sent some Troupes one to the other; and that himselfe was marched neere Vatz, to conferre with the Prince in his passage, to resolue together of the prosecution of their designes. Whereupon the Emperours Agent at the Port made violent exclamations; protested the breach of Peace, and vsed some scandalous arguments against the Friends of the Prince, begged, threatened, and enforced all his powers to diuert or affright the Chimacham; who knew no more than was infused into him, and for the most part beleeued the last man, or as his feares guided him.

The Duke of Weymar and Count Mansfelt arriue in Silesia

D This caused some stop of the dispatch of the inuestiture of the Princesse of Transyluania, and other negotiations of the Prince: And the Agent had procured a Letter from the Grand Seigniour to his Master the Emperour, of excuse; yet referring all conclusion, if they [illegible] Peace, to a treaty with the Prince of Transyluania and Morteza Bassa of Buda. Order[illegible] were dispatched to the Bassa, to beware of impertinent actions, to occasion an vnfeasonable rupture: yet so mingled and qualified, as that they intimated, any thing would be [illegible] that was throughly done. Against the inuestiture the Emperours Agent [illegible] and strength; obiecting, That she was a woman, a stranger, and a German. [illegible] hoped to begin a discontent betweene the Grand Seigniour and the Prince, [illegible] Bassa knowing, that the election once passed, would not be recalled, [illegible] lings but in comE med at the Port, the Prince and Estates of Transyluania would [illegible] many their libertie encroached vpon, and perhaps seeke other refuges [illegible] would willingly haue accepted any returne or aspect towards him. [illegible] to entice the Prince to depend vpon the Emperour, [illegible] his Maiestie may not obtaine at the Port, being at large opened to [illegible] you no way haue [illegible] it was againe resolued to dispatch the Grand [illegible] many (wherin the monie: who was to depart within six dayes) [illegible] purposely written, demanding iustice of The Prince of Transyluania [illegible] such effects, contrarie to the Peace, and being there- [illegible] both Nations, [illegible] you in minde, exhort, and require [illegible] proceedings, and to [illegible] scandall, nor that you take or [illegible] Seigniour, contrarie to the [illegible] wherein you are wisely to con- [illegible] Seignors Dominion; and that [illegible] Peace. We further desire you to examine

[illegible] Transyluania kept his Army in their Hybernation, and that the Grand Seignior gaue order (at the instance of some of his Ministers, fauourers of peace) [illegible] from his gouernment; yet it was most cleere [illegible] dent, and vn- H [illegible] did with all sinceritie endeauour to continue the warre, notwith- [illegible] made for necessitie, and referred for ratification to the Grand Seignior.
[illegible] communication with the Capi-Aga and Caslar-Aga, not communicated to any, [illegible] brought, was sufficient testimonie of his constancie and inward purpo[illegible] of Duke Iohn Ernestus, that Army being want and almost in muti- [illegible] and gaue them two moneths pay, one in [illegible]e, butter, honey, cheese, [illegible] and the other in mony; assuring the [illegible]at they should not want, until further answere and orders came from the Princes, to whom [illegible]e Count of Mansfelt was dispatched. This the Prince writ to the Port, as a greater argu- [illegible]nt (because chargeable) of his diligence to oblige them, which if he meant peace, had been cast away. But after the death I of the old Chimachan (protector of him and all his actions) the Emperours friends wrought [illegible] mercenarie [illegible], and conuerted their feare into a seeming sinceritie and care of [illegible] engagement in a double warr: who finding the State entangled in the troubles of [illegible] the foundation, not only to dispute against any other, but to threaten the con- [illegible] their opinion. These for the most part were men popular, but vtterly ignorant [illegible] affaires of Hungary; yet they so far preuailed (quod in seditionibus accidere solet, vbi plures sententiæ sunt quam causæ, which hapneth in tumults where many are, al men run) that [illegible] Vizier [illegible] was enforced to command the retreit of Mortesa. These things [illegible] in the mean while they concluded to dispatch a new Vizier, & to raise the soldierie [illegible] following him. There was at time to speake of another enemie, and those wise men could do [illegible] one thing at once. But the zeale of this Councell lasting no longer than while it was K [illegible] Ministers, and that the supply of Asia was resolued, and the Grand Seigni- [illegible] being fully informed by Gabors last Letters, which threatened as much on the other side, That if that opportunitie were lost, and that the House of Austria should possesse Germany; or at the best, the Princes colleagued take the example and make peace, hee must expect a sharpe inuasion and reuenge, then when he should haue no friends, and their Army busied in Asia: vrging the neere allyance of the Emperor with the King of Poland, the instigation of the Pope, and whatsoeuer might beget a feare that they should be inclosed with enemies. This admonition taught them the wisedome to be content to keepe their Opposite exercised at anothers charge; and though as yet they durst not, or would not so openly declare, as L to pull the warr vpon themselues, yet they found it necessarie to be continued, and therefore they resolued to temporise, and to auoid a present extremitie, by the colour of the Truce. In the meane time to leaue Bethlem Gabor at his libertie, and to obserue how the Princes proceeded to maintaine and supply their Troupes; meaning to step in when they should see their Armie in the field. To this purpose Mortesa Bassa was re-established in his gouernment, and the businesse so carried with him, that he should make no shew of mouing, vntill the time fit to take horse; and that then he should haue leaue and command to correspond with Gabor according to the occasion.

1627. A Dutch Gentleman dispeeded to the port by the Emperor, disguised in French attyre.

The Emperour hauing had notice of these counsels and designes, dispaiched a Dutch gen- M tleman toward the Port, with Letters and Instructions to his Agent and Friends there; and commanded him to make his iourney by the way of Ragusa, giuing it out that he was a French man, lest he should be discouered in the shorter way by Buda, and stopped, and his papers and Instructions searched. Notwithstanding all this disguise, notice came to the Port before-

A beforehand of the comming of this Messenger; and the Ministers of the Grand Seignior caused him ■ his arriuall to be confined, not suffering him to deliuer any Letters: the Vizier forcing him to decipher his Letter to the Emperours Agent in his presence, not trusting him with his owne secret. The substance whereof was vehement complaint against the Prince of Transyluania; accusing him to be the author of all the troubles and discontents of the frontier. That since his aduancement it was not possible to maintaine the Peace, nor that Amity which was contracted betweene their kingdoms; intimating a desire to haue him deposed, as a perturber of the world. Expostulating the mouing of those new Armes and the preparations of the Bassa of Buda. He had Letters likewise to the Grand Seignior, but was not suffered to deliuer them: but they resolued to send him backe to Buda, there to open his
B message, and if it should seeme fit to Bethlem Gabor and the Bassa to treat peace, that then an Embassadour from the Emperour should be accepted, but no inferiour person, nor querelous Letters. Thus it was plotted to the aduice of Gabor; who gaue this counsell, that he might in all occasion both know the secret, and direct the answer, and by making himselfe seeme necessarie to the Turkes, he guided all their resolutions to his owne ends. On the other side, Mortesa Bassa hauing had notice, that a messenger was stollen by, and arriued & heard at the Port, sent a Post with Letters, complaining, That he should haue any entertainment there, or was admitted any audience: That if the Grand Seignior had with confidence really referred the conclusion of peace or warre to Bethlem Gabor and himselfe, all other Treaty was impertinent and hurtfull, and might produce vncertaintie or contrarietie in the resolution; de-C siring that he might be dismissed instantly and sent to him, because one of the Imperial commissioners being arriued at Comara, had aduertised, That they could not enter into conference vntill the returne of this Messenger. Whereupon the Vizier dispeeded him without any answer to the Emperour, or Treaty, or other resolution than that which was formerly mentioned; rather taking from him, than receiuing his Letters; only a Fede for his discharge was giuen him, that he had brought and presented them, but comming from the country of an Enemie, they could not be accepted. Thus he was sent to Mortesa by a Chaus, and with him an answer to the Bassa, That his negotiation was wholly referred to him and the prince of Transyluania; with this caution, That he should protract, and beware to be rashly ingaged in an open warre.

D About the one and twentieth of Aprill newes came to the Port from Cairo, signifying the reuolt of Gemen in Arabia, vnder a pretending prince whom they call an Ayman or Priest: That he had ouerrunne the Countrey, and besieged the Bassa in the principall Citie. To whose reliefe the Bassa of Cairo had sent by Suachim in the Red-Sea three thousand soldiers; but it was aduised, That if more succours were not supplied, that the Holy Country would be lost. This caused frequent Councels, and did much trouble the State; especially the feare of Mecha, Medina, and the deuotions of their Prophet. The great Vizier arriued at Aleppo, but complained for men, munition, and money: to raise the first, the Viziers of the Bench were sent abroad; one to Greece, another to Natolia, a third to Tartarie, others to other places; insomuch as the City was left desolate. Munition was aduentured by sea to E Scanderone; and mony extorted from the poorer (per fas & nefas) or drawne from rich subiects (precario) to concurre to assist in the publique want.

A dead silence now possessed all things; and there was little newes from the Prince of Transyluania, how he proceeded, nor what he purposed: only the tripartite Commissioners were met at Comaran, where they treated; and the generall inclination of the Ministers at the Port being wholly bent to peace, they aduised Mortesa secretly, and excused themselues to Gabor vpon the Mufti; whose feares the Imperials had made the ground of their hopes, and that Councel. But it seemes it was resolued at least, not to breake; the Emperors Commissioners pressing a resolution on the one side, and Gabor on the other raising new difficulties, and endeauouring to dissolue the Treaty, and to leaue the occasion of the warr open F to time and opportunitie. The Turkes being driuen vp in a streight how to please both, fell at last vpon the Prince, accusing him, That he had in December before treated apart, and made his owne peace with the Emperour, vpon conditions to his owne aduantage, without consulting the Port: which was true; for vpon the retreit of his Army, and the dispaire of the forces of Count Mansfelt, (which hee found weakened by a long march) and the dis-union of the Generals, he had treated and signed Articles; but as he pretended, they were concluded in a Councell, with the content of his Friends or their ministers: which as he could not directly deny, so he did not absolutely confesse; tempering what he had done with diuers conditions; of the declaration; of the consent of his Allyes; and the ratification of the Grand Seignior. This Treaty was noysed and bruted from Vienna, and the copy sent to Constantinople purposely to discredit him: to that it was no more a secret; and therefore the Prince dispatched a Poste to his Embassador, to satisfie those who might except against him: professing not onely what he had done apart by necessitie, and for want of succour, but that he would proceed in the generall Treaty: because there was no other way to winne the Ministers of the Grand Seignior; who so much affected the assurance of the Border, that they would not beleeue any arguments, as sauoring of other interests, but that he would at the conuention raise so many rocks and impossibilities, as that the breach of the conference should be the beginning of the warre, and a bond of necessitie in the Turkes to partake in it. The Emperour remaining still iealous of delayes, sent another messenger to the Port, with a second complaint against Bethlem Gabor and Morteza Bassa, as the disturbers of the armes, Truce; and an expression of his feruent desire to maintaine a good peace with the Ottoman Empire, which he said could neuer be secured, vnlesse the Grand Seignior should plant Ministers in the frontier gouernments, as were louers of the publique quiet. For the effecting whereof he had sent his Deputies to meet those of the Port, who hauing agreed (as he pretended) vpon Articles, and reconciled all differences, [that] he was ready to send a great Embassadour thither, to confirme whatsoeuer should there be concluded. This was chiefly to get an acceptance of some person of Qualitie to be present at the Port; which Gabor and Morteza Bassa hindred, to keepe that State without any light but such as they pleased to giue them. But it being obiected to the Messenger by the Vizier, That the Emperor had made a Peace apart with the Prince, and that therefore he had obtained his ends without the communication of the Grand Seignior, which gaue much suspition of sinister purposes; the Emperours Messenger did not deny but that there was some such thing done; but that his Master did not trust in it, nor could euer rest secure in the word of that Prince, vnlesse the authoritie of the Port did strengthen it. In conclusion, feare on the one part to lose an opportunitie of peace; the death of Mansfelt, some disasters of the Friends of the Prince in Germanie, and the failing of aids expected, all concurring on the other part, made both soften and decline, and resolue to take care onely of their owne affaires, and to leaue the World at libertie. K

The Captaine Bassa dispatched with an Armado into the Black-sea.

The Captaine Bassa was sent vp to the Euxine sea with a gallant fleet for flagges and streamers, resolute to attempt the shutting in of the Cossacks by building two Forts on the outlets of the Boristhenes: who prepared to resist him, and were intrenched neere his expected descent. The Poles made some braues, That they would assist them, and maintaine their Frontier, as Lords of that ground: but it was not beleeued they would hazard their peace with the Grand Seignior, by fighting with his Generall, but rather conniue till he should be returned, and then to raze and ouerthrow what was raised, and excuse it vpon their outlawes. This enterprise was like to cost some knockes; but as matters then stood, the Poles were not L in state to make any great progresse, the King of Sweden hauing diuerted them to their owne defence in Prussia: yet howsoeuer they resolued in this particular, they must keepe an Army on foot, lest they tempted the Enemie to vse the occasion.

While all the sea forces were imployed in this designe, the Arches were left vngarded, and 6 gallies of the great duke of Tuscany came to the mouth of the Hellespont, & took one Gallion and many lesser ships of the Cairo fleet; the booty whereof by report amounted to some millions of dollars. This sudden alarme caused the Grand Seignior to send into the Blacke-Sea to recall some forces, and instantly from the Armado twelue gallies were spared, and dispatched to seeke the Christians, who were departed with their riches.

An Embassadour from Persia arriueth at Aleppo.

There arriued at the same time a Persian Embassador at Aleppo with ouertures of peace: M vpon whom the Grand Vizier put gards, neither accepting nor refusing his message; and sent to the Port to declare, that the State must either furnish him with a million and halfe of gold, and store of munition, or else grant him a Commission to entertaine that opportunitie and motion of Treaty; for with lesse supplies he could not proceed. The first was impossible, and

A and the later much against the stomach; but a fresh aduice bringing the report of a great Embassadour following the former with rich Presents, and faire offers, made many beleeue or hope a happy conclusion; though men of best iudgements esteemed it very difficult, vnlesse Babylon should be surrendred. All men made this conclusion, That if peace could be setled on that side, the Turkes had yet spleene enough to reuenge the braues they had endured from the Imperials; who though they sought a Truce, prosecuted it insolently, threatening fire and sword if they obtained not their desires. And thus the Treaty at Comaran had ebbs and flouds, heats and colds, as the feare or hope of the affaires of Asia did temper it.

The Persian Embassador arriueth at the Port.

This expected Persian Embassadour not long after arriued at the Port, with little hope to buy peace at a cheaper rate than the surrender of Babylon. And the gallies of the Grand B Seignior sent in pursuit of the Florentines, by great diligence ouertooke them in a port of Morea, and recouered all the prizes, [So their great wealth was like a dreame, when they awaked it vanished:] And vpon the sixteenth of Iune they returned and entered in triumph, towing in all the repriseds booty. It seemes they were become too rich to fight, and the Turkes, though superiour in strength and number, were content with the gaine, and glad not to force men alreadie spoyled, into dispaire.

About the first of Iuly the Bassa of Buda sent poste to the port, with aduice, that the emperors commissioners at Comaran had presented certain articles, containing accounts & restitutions: which being sent to him, he had receiued, but could not allow them; answering, That the Grand Seignior did not treat with Merchants; Which had like to haue bred confusion: but C that they were since entered into new conference, and had concluded in the generall, a resolution to peace; with consent that both parties should haue time to send to their Masters for fresh instructions in particulars. Whereupon he had dispatched that messenger to the Port, to vnderstand the sence, & to receiue absolute directions from thence. By him Bethlem Gabor did write a sharpe Letter; confessing plainly (seeing he could not longer conceale it) that hee had made peace for himselfe; but accused the negligence of those Ministers as the cause thereof: First, That they would neuer constantly trust his aduices of the opportunitie of the warre; but their Mufti and Booke-men, who were fitter to interpret their Law, than to iudge of the Word and matters of State. That he would be true to the Grand Seignior, but yet not neglect himselfe, when he saw how little care, authority, and credit was giuen to him; D That the Letters written to him from the Vizier were ambiguous and irresolute, but that diuers others had threatened him not to be the occasion of a warre. And therefore, to proue himselfe faithfull and true to his owne first counsels, he offered, That if the Grand Seignior would breake off the Treaty, and resolue to vse the time, that he was readie to march in six dayes warning. He amplified the prosperitie of the remaines of Mansfelts Army in Silesia, the occasion, and all other fit arguments to moue them to a change of those degenerate councels of peace. But this was an art, to cast the fault on others, for the conclusion of that which he had suffered to proceed, and beyond his power to remedie. Yet it much perplexed the Vizier, who excused himselfe, and returned all the blame vpon the Lawyers, as men ignorant, by whom he had been ouerborne; and that he neuer consented to peace or Treatie in E his owne iudgement, but had proceeded sincerely according to his engagement, as far as he durst, and, that so much his continuall Letters witnessed for him; promising, that hee would cause a Consultation to answer these aduices, and that he would not agree to any conclusion without the satisfaction of the prince and all others that were friends to the Port, and the restitution of the oppressed libertie. Which solemnly handled in a full Councell, and Orders dispatched away as the finall resolution of that State, to leaue the power of making peace, or breaking the Treaty, to the iudgement of Gabor and the Bassa of Buda, wholly and without restriction.

What effects this would worke was somewhat vncertaine; but such appeared the inclination of those into whose hands the Treaty was now referred, that there was a strong opinion, the Emperour should faile of the securitie expected: Especially because the ouertures of peace which the Persian made by his Embassador there ariued, together with their necessitie, had raised some shew of inclination to hearken to accommodation in those parts. But it came aduised from the Treaty, That the Commissioners being met the second time, the Imperials insisted vpon high termes, demanding a ratification of the old Peace of Zitwa, then expired, without union of the Generals, he had treated and signed Articles; but as he pretended, they concluded in a Councell, with the consent of his friends or chiefe ministers: which could not directly deny, so he did not absolutely confesse; temperizing

The Governors, Admirals, Commanders of Ships, and other his Maiesties Subiects trading in the Kingdome or Gulfe of Persia.

After our louing commendations:

The Emperour admonisheth the Persian Gulfe.

WHereas Aly Bassa, Bassa of Balsara, hath sent his Letters to this high Port by the hands of two of his seruants inhabiting in those parts; by them informing the Grand Seignour, That the English nation trading in the Persian Gulfe, in Ormus, Iasques, Mumbrun, and other parts of the kingdome of Persia, do make prize & take the Vessels and Frigots of the subiects of the Grand Seignour dwelling in Balsara, Lasha, and the coasts of Arabia, trading to Meschit, India, Goa, and Cuisum: and that they make Slaues of all the passengers, Merchants or other, that they finde vpon the said Vessels, being subiects of this Empire. Further, That they do vnite themselues with the Persian (now in warre with the Grand Seignour) assisting him not onely with munition, but Vessels & frigots; and that they help and teach the Persians (enemies of this Port) to build Gallies, Galliots, and other Vessels of warre, to arme in those seas; prouiding them of Shipwrights and all other necessaries for the fitting of an Armado, thereby to inuade or besiege the Port of Balsara, or Lasha, or to make incursions vpon the territories of this Empire. Which actions being alledged to be contrary to the Capitulations of his most sacred Maiestie, and to the publique Peace and commerce betweene these Kingdomes, I haue beene called before the Chimacham, Deputie to the Great Vizier, to make answer to these obiections, and to prouide some timely remedie, before those proceedings shall giue further occasion of discontent. To which accusations I being able, concerning the fact, to say nothing; but that knowing such actions to be vniust and vnlawfull, and contrary to the will of his sacred Maiestie, and your Commissions and Instructions from the Companie and your Principals, for whome you serue: I do hope that herein you haue not offended, nor giuen any iust occasion of lament, vnlesse you haue beene thereunto by like acts of hostilitie prouoked. Notwithstanding being vrged by the great Ministers of this Port; and that it will require so much time to enforme his Maiestie, and to seeke redresse by so long a course, (to whom neuertheless the Grand Seignour will write his Letters of complaint, to require Iustice in such case) and for the preuention of future euills of very great importance to the subiects of his Maiestie (which you may easily conceiue) and for the declaration of his Maiesties sincere and constant purpose to maintaine a good and iust Peace with the Grand Seignour & all his dominions, which I know to be his Maesties royal will: and that I make no doubt of your obedience

A dience to all his Orders and purposes, like good subiects that must answer your actions at the tribunall of his high iustice; I haue thought fit and very requisite to send you this our Declaration, and in the name of his Maiestie to admonish and require you, That you presume not to take or make prize of any of the Vessels or Subiects of the Grand Seignior, trading in the sea where soeuer; nor to make any spoyle of their goods, or hurt or detaine their persons: nor that you intermeddle not in any inuasion or attempt of the King of Persia, to assist him or his Armes against the subiects or Dominions of the Grand Seignour, neither by sea nor land, nor by prouiding them of munition, Shipwrights, or other Artsmen, to teach them the vse of Gallies, thereby to inuade the territories or subiects of this Empire; but that therein you carry your selues neutrally and indifferently, betweene two Princes both in peace and amitie with his Maiestie. Wishing you well to consider, the inconuenience
B which may arise to others, and the damage in time to your selues, by teaching a powerfull Nation to vse their strength in sea-causes, of which they are now vtterly ignorant, and of which practise wee haue a lamentable example in these seas. And no way doubting, That like good subiects, you will conforme your actions and proceedings in those Seas to the rules of his Maiestie (for that such is his will and pleasure, In declaration whereof I haue affixed his Royall Seale) yet I am enforced to protest, That the contrarie will giue occasion of much trouble and danger to your selues, and in the end losse and damage to your Principals.

Giuen in Constantinople the third of September, in the yeare of Grace 1627.

C

Halil Bassa Great Vizier, sent to the warre in the end of the last yeare, being arriued at Diarbecher, resolued to enter Persia (notwithstanding that the King had an Embassadour at the Port treating of peace) and gaue order to certaine Beglerbeghs to make another inuasion by Van; and did endeauour to draw Abassa Bassa, with his Forces ioyned with the Georgians, to do the like on his frontier: who gaue good words, and hopes of due obedience. Whilest these designes were in preparation, the Persian by his Generall besieged Achiska, a Citie of great importance neere Arzirum: Whereupon Halil sent Distenk Bassa of Natolia, with six other Bassa's, to Abassa, to persuade him presently to performe his word, and to rise and vnite his strength with them. With these he sent three thousand Ianizaries vnder twelue Captains, with his owne Letters; who being arriued neere the City, he appointed them to incampe, and sent them prouision for a day or two, vntill he could put his affaires for his departure in order. These resting secure, in the night he set vpon them and cut them in pieces, some few escaping to the Port. Distenk and another, Muchmet Bassa, were slaine; the Captaines that he tooke aliue, or came to him to treat, he sent to the Persian: whereby Achiska being in great distresse, and vnsuccoured, was presently surrendred to the Enemie. This newes being brought to the great Vizier, the next morning he rose with all his whole Army, laying aside all designe against Persia, and marched right to Arzirum; vowing to punish the Rebell, or there to end his life: who was strong, fortified, victualled, prouided, and resolute.

The Persian besiegeth Achiska.

Notwithstanding all the colours, protestations, and perturbations of the Prince of Tran-
E syluania, That he would finde occasion and quarrell to dissolue the Treaty of Comaran, or that he would separate himselfe from the Turkes; yet at last he sent his Embassadour Francis Micoserentz to the Grand Seignour, about the later end of October, to acquaint him that the peace was concluded. And within a few dayes after, the Internuntio of the Emperor arriued with a branch of oliues at the Port: And this Embassadour and two Agents of Gabor went to the Chimacham with a Letter from their Master, vnder the Seale of great secrecie; of fresh aduice, That the King of Denmarke was vtterly broken and fled into certaine Islands, all his Countrey, and Germany prostrate at the mercy of the Emperour (which newes the Imperials had formerly spread) counselling the Chimacham to make an end of their peace with the Emperour, and to dispatch and accept of any Conditions, and to send the Internuntio away F with speed and content; lest the Austrians puffed vp with those victories, should take the aduantage of their delay, and present them worse termes, or refuse it absolutely. Whereupon the Ministers of the Port resolued easily to peace; changing former Ænigmaticall Letters they had written, and huddled vp a hasty Conclusion. They added further, That the Princes of Germanie treated a Pacification, which was like also to take effect; and either way, that the

the Emperour would be at liberty to make warre vpon him. Whether they feigned the first part, to accelerate the ratification; or feared the later, and that their Master should therein deseruedly be left out, was hard to iudge: but they onely by this office (which the Turke did beleeue was sincere) merited of the Emperour the consummation of what was done; and thereupon they Both made their attonement with the Emperour, according to their seuerall Capitulations.

What was the secret cause and reason of this sudden alteration, Gabor hauing made all demonstration, that he would continue the war; hauing proceeded euen to threats and protests against the Ministers of the Port; and being irritated anew after the conclusion of his owne Treaty, by the complaints and practises of the Emperours Agents, to bring him into disgrace or ruine; so that hee could repose no trust in an enemie ne[w] reconciled, and so often prouoked; did breed much inquisition, and many doubts some great mistery, either of his reuolt wholly to the Imperiall part, or that he had some other high designe in Poland. But those who were lesse speculatiue and curious, and looked onely vpon euident matter, concluded, That finding himselfe betraye[d] and forsaken by Morteza Bassa, and that he could no longer disguise his owne ends, which [were], To oblige the Emperour to him for the Peace, if it were made; and to blinde the Turkes, to conuert their force and authoritie to better his conditions in the Peace; and that hee foresaw so much renitencie and inconstancie in them to prosecute the war, the vigour whereof depended vpon contingencies and the successe of the Vizier in Asia; that he resolued to preuent, being preuented & discouered. For certainly if he had not roundly shut vp the occasion, by being the first that seemed to merit of both parts, in reconciling the difficultie he himselfe had raised, he had been stript naked, and left in the state of the Constable Count of S. Pol, betweene Lewis the 11 of France, and the Duke of Bourgundie. This onely was obserued by all, That whatsoeuer the ends of Gabor and Morteza were while they were vnited in counsels, they did suffer the Grand Seigniour to know no more than conduced to those ends, and that they had power to change the resolutions of the Port, with euery winde of rumor they pleased to obtrude: and that if Gabor had beene countenanced and nourished in his hopes, to weare the Crowne of Hungarie (which was the scope of all his intentions) that he had credit and wit enough to haue moulded the Turkes (who saw the affaires of Christendome onely through the glasse of his relations) to his owne designes; and that he would haue continued the warre at his pleasure; and they at whose cost it had beene made, should haue beene the least and last, to know the internall motiue. For so it often happens, That great Princes and States haue beene inuolued in troubles, and shut vp with Peaces, vnder the specious name of The Publique good, by the passions, designes, or ambitions of their Allyes or Ministers, the cause and pretext being seldome rightly distinguished.

It hath beene formerly intimated, That Gabor had secretly treated apart; and now the generall Peace being concluded, the Articles themselues will most cleerely discouer, either to what streights the Prince was driuen, or what were his intentions; the order of Time giuing place to that of Story, we haue chosen this period to publish them.

Articles of Peace concluded betweene the Emperour of Germany, Ferdinand, and Bethlem Gabor Prince of Transyluania, in the moneth of December, 1626.

I. THe Prince of Transyluania doth promise, by the Faith of a Christian, neuer to moue Armes or vse any hostilitie against the Maiestie of the Emperour, or the House of Austria, or their Successours; much lesse to enter into their Dominions with an Armie: Not to aid his Enemies, nor to keepe correspondence with them: Not to plot any innouation in the Kingdome of Hungarie or other Christian Countries; neither to stirre vp and

and prouoke the Turks or Tartars, or others, to inuade them: Not to entertaine nor assist in any euill Counsell against his Maiestie, nor to giue eare to the requests and desires of his Enemies; but rather to reueale all their conspiracies and wickednesses which shall be made made knowne vnto him: and by all meanes to demonstrate and shew a sincere minde truly desirous of Peace, and solicitous of the Common good.

II. That the Prince shall instantly depart with his whole Army out of the territories and cities of the Emperour; and that he shall restore as well all goods belonging to the Imperial Treasure, as those of his faithfull subiects.

III. That he shall remoue from him the Rebell Mansfelt, and all other his Followers and adherents desirous to inuade the Dominions of the Emperour. And that he shall not ayd any Stranger whatsoeuer, who at his instance hath entered into the territories of his Maiestie with Count Mansfelt; to whom Letters of publique safety shall be giuen, that they may returne by twenty or thirty in a Troupe; with condition, That in no place of their retreit they shall ioyne with the enemies of the Emperour.

IV. That seeing it is fit for the establishing of the Peace, that the inhabitants of Countries and Cities belonging to the Prince, by the consent of the Emperour, should remaine during his life, in obedience and fidelitie to him; and that those Inhabitants should do homage to the Emperour (sauing their corporall Oath to the Prince) to keepe inuiolate those Articles: That they should haue leaue by Letters of full authoritie and power granted them by the Prince in their first assemblies and Conuentions, to make such oath of Homage.

V. That at the same time of the performing of the Homage and Oath, besides the Oath before the last warre, they shall take a new, according to the agreement betweene the Prince and the Commissioners of the Emperour.

VI. The Prince shall procure, that all places vpon the confines which were taken by the Turkes in the last warre, shall be restored: and that all Captiues on both sides shall be set at libertie: and that the Prince shall procure the freedome of all such the Emperours subiects as shall be in the Turkish captiuitie.

VII. That all the subiects of the Emperour, lately inticed and drawne to the seruice of the Prince, shall be free from their Oath: and if the Prince haue any of their Letters of obligation in his hands, that he shall restore them: And that these conditions confirmed, all other things formerly treated, shall remaine in their former state and vigour.

VIII. That if any other difficulties arise, they shall be accommodated with fidelitie and quietnesse, by Commissioners on both parts: And that all those who in the last commotion haue serued the Prince, shall be absolued, according to the Treaty and agreement at Vienna.

IX. That all Inhabitants of Counties and Cities which haue serued the Prince, shall be absolued; onely those excepted who haue voluntarily taken vp armes against the Emperour, for whom he shall onely intercede: excusing alwayes priuate men which haue done priuate wrongs, for they shall according to Law and custome, seeke their restitution by Ciuile Action.

X. That all other Articles of peace concluded at Nichilsburg and Vienna, shall remaine in their former vigour and force: except vpon the behalfe of the Emperour, the payment of thirty thousand Dollars, and the care of the confines granted vnto the Prince. And that all goods of the Emperours Clergy, possessed by the Prince, shall be restored, from the yeare 1619, till this present day: Except the Abbyes of Replana, belonging to the Seminarie of Strigonium; for which the Prince shall pay to the Emperor yearely fiue hundred Florens.

the Emperour would be at liberty to make warre vpon him. Whether they feigned the firſt part, to accelerate the ratification; or feared the later, and that their Maſter ſhould therein deſeruedly be left out, was hard to iudge: but they onely by this office (which the Turke did beleeue was ſincere) merited of the Emperour the conſummation of [illegible] thereupon they Both made their attonement with the Emperour, [illegible] Capitulations.

And although we haue declared heretofore vpon our Imperiall B part, that we would haue made new Capitulations; yet ſince it hath euer beene our Regall cuſtome, affectionately to correſpond with the intentions of thoſe great Princes which profeſſe amitie, deuotion, and friendſhip to our high Port (by the immence fauour of God, the ſtay and refuge of great Lords and Princes;) We declare and demonſtrate our ſingular greatneſſe and magnificence, and approue ſufficiently, and hold lawfull the confirmation of the Peace for the ſpace of twenty fiue yeares, according to the ſaid Letter, beginning from the yeare* 1627. Whereupon our high Order is giuen out in writing, for ratifying and confirming of theſe our new Imperiall Capitulations.

FErdinand the second, by the grace of God Emperour of Germanie, &c. We giue notice hereby to your Maiestie, That by the diligence and wisedome of our Commissioners on both parts, all controuersies which haue heretofore happened are well accommodated, and all iniuries and hostilities of the future preuented. Now for the better and more exact obseruance of this our said Treaty, we haue sent vnto your Maiestie our Internuntio Stephano Baloc, Captaine of Tata, to giue you notice of the Agreement betweene our said Commissioners, and to present you with the Capitulations, [illegible] and [illegible] them. Which we pray your Maiestie to accept word for word; and [illegible] with your Imperiall hand, that you will send them back [illegible] Not doubting but your Maiesty out of your benignitie and [illegible] will obs[erue] the same, as we vpon our part do promise.

Commission Sheweth.

[illegible] there follow no action from any Ministers, [illegible] to the said Treaty [illegible] and [illegible] thereby God our Creatour, who made the whole world of nothing; and by the honour which we beare to our most high Prophet Mahomet Mustapha, That there shall not be done during the whole terme of the said Peace, the least hurt or damage to the subiects Countries, Kingdomes, Castles, or Ports of the said Emperour, by any of our Ministers or Armies, nor to any Christian slaues subiect to our happy Port.

I haue chosen the Capitulations as they were signed by the Grand Seigniour; which though the Articles are very generall, and matters of the greatest moment either referred, or not fully established, yet being therefore aduantageous for the Turke, who would not accord an vpright dehmition, because by the vertue of former Treaties, all places surprised ought to be restored, and depredations satisfied, he would neither breake, nor yet oblige himselfe to reparation: and indeed the difficulties were inseparable by Turkish Law; for no place can be surrendred to the Christian, where a Mosche hath beene erected; which was the case of Vaiz: And the Emperour could not consent to abandon his claime with charitie grounded on the Articles of Vienna; so that both sides were contented to be vnited, rather than pacified for the time, and both did thinke that they had the aduantage: The Emperor, M In preferring his Title; The Turke, In not declaring. So the one part accepting the signature of the other, without dispute, the bodies of the Treaties being very different, if not contrarie; yet so desirous they were of peace, that they did wittingly ouersee, one the arts of the other: and in effect, there was no firme Peace established, but that either side might find first matter

A *rages done vpon the subiects of both Parties. Whereupon the said Commissioners of the aforesaid place did treat and conclude a good Peace for the [illegible] and in the current yeere of our great Prophet Mahomet Mustapha, the [illegible] and in the yeere of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] portunitie hath loſt the Grace that gaue it; and that a common repentance wil requite a com- G mon ſinne and folly.

Hauing drawne our Hiſtorie for matters concerning the Temporall eſtate, and the reuolutions therein, vnto a period; it will not be impertinent nor vnprofitable, to make ſome relation of the Greeke Church, and the affaires thereof: which ſuffered many perturbations and aſſaults during theſe times, as if one Influence had diſpoſed all things to vniuerſall trouble: but the cauſes were farre differing. There are yet remaining vnder the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, Metropolitans and Biſhops, who liue with freedome of conſcience and Religion vnder the Grand Seignior, and gouerne the Chriſtian Flocke, vnder their ſeuerall Iuriſdictions; and haue their antient churches, with ſome competent reuenue in their own poſſeſſion, teaching, preaching, and adminiſtring the holy Sacraments according to their owne Rites, without any moleſtation for matters of Religion. The preſent Patriarch is called Cyrillus, formerly gouerning the See of Alexandria, a reuerend and learned man, who hath deſired to reforme many errours, and enlighten much of the blindeneſſe of his Church; inſenſibly preuailing, for want of Lectures, Shooles, and Bookes, and by the mixture of Barbariſme. His reuenue, (though very good) and that of his Biſhops not ariſing out of viſible lands and rents, but by ſecret contribution, and other duties; and the ſimplicitie of their life and habit, without ſhew or pompe, giuing no occaſion formerly to the Turkes to expect any profit by vexing them, as is vſually practiſed vpon other lay Chriſtians. They liued in great peace and tranquilitie; vntill of late yeares the Church of Rome, hoping either by the pouertie of the one, and the greatneſſe of the other, to force the Greekes to a ſubmiſſion, or perhaps, enuious of their quiet, to weary them by trouble, or to ſubuert them. To this end a I Greeke Colledge was by the laſt Gregory erected in Rome, to breed vp the Youth of that nation; where they had liberty of all their owne Rites, onely acknowledging the ſupremacie of the Pope, which they muſt do: and that ground being layd, for poynt of doctrine it matters not; there is enough gained to make him that had ſworne obedience, to accept of all the reſt. By this foundation the Pope hoped to breed Proſelites enow in time to poſſeſſe all the Biſhoprickes, and to ſubdue the whole Church. For theſe Students returned admired men for their education and knowledge, and wanted not meanes to promoue their preferment; which was a great aduantage ouer the ignorant breeding and diſcipline of the meere Greeke. But by the foreſight and wiſedome of Cyrillus this plot taking little effect, as it did irritate K the Pope and Cardinals againſt his perſon, ſo it did incite them to ſeeke other more powerfull meanes of corruption, or to ruine him. And both were put in practiſe. To this end a Congregation was erected to take care of the Eaſterne Church, and to direct the practiſes vpon it; whereof a principall Cardinall was made Protector: and many Conſiſtories were held, by which way to reduce the Greeke Church to obedience, or to root out all thoſe that oppoſed it. It was reſolued to make titular Biſhops of almoſt all the Sees (eſpecially in the Iſlands) where any Greeke Biſhop had reſidence; ſo that there were many Paſtors without a flocke. But theſe Emiſſaries being diſcouered to be ſupplanters and diſturbers of the poore Church, were alſo reſiſted, and ſome caſt into priſon; and ſome aſhamed of their empty honour, voluntarily returned. But all theſe deuices failing, they fell at laſt vpon the round and L moſt aſſured way of force, to worke their ends by the Embaſſadours of Chriſtian princes of the Romiſh Religion reſiding at Conſtantinople, and the moſt potent of briberie and corruption: making vſe of the impotencie of the Turkiſh Miniſters, who they knew would ſell Mahomet himſelfe for gold: Flectere ſi nequeo ſuperos Acheronta mouebo. From this reſolution did all the danger and miſchiefe ſpring: and certainly the zeale of their Church is cloathed with ſo much honour and ſolicitouſneſſe, that in that onely it prouoked enuy. But whether they haue in this purſuit and cauſe proceeded with the rules of Chriſtian charitie, in that place among Falſe-Beleeuers, where euery ſcandall did concerne the honour of Chriſt himſelfe, or nor, I leaue to the iudgement of euery ingenious man. And becauſe this Part, of the quarrels betweene the Roman and Greeke Church, though acted in ſeuerall yeares, hath M beene related entirely by a ſincere Pen, in a Letter directed to a noble Senatour of Venice, whereby the paſſages will be more cleere and continuous, than if they had beene mingled and interrupted with other affaires; I haue rather choſen my owne eaſe and the Readers profit,

A profit, by tranſlating that Letter, to ſerue it in all at once, than by pieces and fragments. The occaſion whereof ariſing (as I am informed) from the varietie of reports and printed pamphlets, of the laſt Act concerning the baniſhment of the Ieſuites, and a rumour ſpred, that they were reſtored: the truth whereof it ſeemes that Senator did deſire to know, and therefore prouoked ſome Friend to ſatisfie him. And ſo without other preiudice, I referre you to the Text it ſelfe following.

The Copy of a Letter written to a Senator of Venice, concerning the contentions betweene the Roman and Greeke Churches in Conſtantinople.

My Lord,

C YOur Letter hath layed vp.n me a charge, that (if I were able to performe) is ſo full of enuy, and ſubiect to diuers cenſures, according to the preparations of the Hearers of a matter of that nature, that I would haue choſen to haue obeyed you in any other way, rather than in that of a Relator. For I perceiue by you, ſome preiudice is already gone out, and hath taken poſſeſſion of a part of the world, harder to remoue than to teach a new hereſie. But hoping that you ſeeke the ſatisfaction of your owne curioſitie, and that you purpoſe not to controuert, I will not refuſe, againſt my owne reaſon, and little leiſure, to returne you aſſurance, how farre you haue power ouer them and me.

IT is now ten moneths ſince this conflict betweene the Greeke Church and the Ieſuits here fell out, but not the firſt time they haue been in trouble, impriſonment, and ablegation. They were ſettled in Galata by the Grand Seigniours Licence, vnder the French protection, D about twenty fiue yeares ſince; in which time they had gotten a good Seat, builded much, gathered together a faire Librarie, and wonne greatly vpon the weaker Sect, and aged women and children. I ſpeake of the Greeks; for with the Romaniſts they had leaſt credit, who adhered to their antient Orders of Saint Francis and Dominicke; and were affraid that this new Societie would be too buſie, and caſt them into danger of their old priuiledges: for the Turkes are plaine, and yet raſh, and eaſily apprehend euery innouation.

The pretence of this Colledge was, To teach children for nothing, or charitie, Grammar, the Arts, and Tongues. And there being no open Schoole in thoſe parts, and few books for want of printing, the Greekes (who loue learning beſt, when it is beſt cheape) were content their children ſhould gleane tares in any field, to ſaue their purſes: and their wiues E were wonne by eloquence & affabilitie, to open their ſins to them, who had more witty penances than Greekiſh ſhrift, Faſting, which did decay their beauty, and deiect their countenances. But the wiſer ſort, eſpecially the Patriarch Cyrillus, and his Biſhops, diſcouered Anguem in herba; and did foreſee, That by this ſeeming benefit, the Youth of their Nation might be corrupted (Seruabit odorem teſta diu) and their owne boſomes tempted by the Daughters of Eue: And they likewiſe did feare, That vpon this foundation might be nouriſhed Proſelites to Rome, that in time would vndermine the whole Church. And therefore did as modeſtly as they could (to preuent an open diſſention) ſeeke to withdraw both from this bait of ſeducement. Hinc illæ lachrimæ: For when the Ieſuits did diſcouer they were diſcouered, they began to practiſe that by force which they had long deſigned. The firſt F open war brake out in Februarie, 1622; when theſe Fathers (protected by the French Embaſſadour) attempted to depoſe the Patriarch, and to place another Greeke in his Chayre, who had ſecretly ſubmitted to the Pope, and promiſed to render new obedience to the See of Rome.

Whereupon Cyrillus conſulted his friends, how to auoyd their enuy. He reſolued to proceed fortunitie had lost the Grace that gaue it, [illegible] the seduced Bishop, resolue of his [illegible] C thon sinne and folly. [illegible] preached and published the Counsels held [illegible] against the Iesuites, Ouerture than by sol-[illegible] and Instruments, against whomsoeuer should be [illegible] they declared not. And then being assisted with [illegible] present, he excommunicated that Greeke [illegible] [illegible] this [illegible] ration to the one, and Example on [illegible] to [illegible] ing of [illegible] by Christ to his Church. The pretence of this quarrell [illegible] the same was published by the French Party, to haue root, because that the [illegible] kept company with Lutherans and Heretiques, and therefore must needs fa-[illegible] of the same Heauen. This modest course did but exasperate, for the Iesuites ha- H [illegible] for them. In April following, by subornation of others, accuse Cyrillus [illegible] ray an Island in the Arches, to the Florentines, and by the promise of [illegible] thousand Dollars for the establishment of the excommunicate Bishop, they preuailed to haue the Patriarch apprehended, deposed, and sent prisoner to Rhodes, where he suffered many miseries and outrages, and their Friend to be placed in his seat. But the Greeke Church, though they durst not oppose the present furie, yet would neither acknowledge Pastorem qui non intrauit per Portam, nor resort to the Cathedrall, nor contribute any mony to pay the fine due to the Grand Seignior vpon remoue, vpon which the French rely-ed: for though they had promise from Rome of aid, yet it was not leuied. Whereby finding themselues in a streight, they made meanes to a silly Archbishop of Adrianople, who was I rich, to take the charge; the other willingly resigning vnto him: who accepting the offer, aduanced part of the Symonie, and leuied the rest by force of Turkish Commands vpon the poore Greekes; and so he was in appearance effectually seated. Their purpose was not long to suffer this man to continue, but onely to hold the See full vntill supply came from the Pope, and then to depose him, and place one fitted for their designes. By this mutation they hoped to recouer all the Greekes to the Catholique Cause, and Spaine. And in these changes the Patriarchie was robbed of most of the antient Manuscripts and other Ornaments of the Church.

In September following, Cyrillus by helpe of friends, and force of money, was restored to liberty, and returned to Constantinople. Where being arriued, all the Greekes flocked to K him: Which the Archbishop of Adrianople obseruing, and knowing himselfe an Intruder, (the true Patriarch neither resigning, nor being Canonically depriued) secretly and voluntārily came and submitted, and offered to surrender the charge to him. But Cyrillus not daring to accept it, vntill meanes were made to the State, or that he were recalled by a Synod, was content the Church should be vacant, to see what would of it selfe emerge. The French Embassadour hearing of this sudden defection from him, by the counsell of his Iesuites fetched their Archbishop into his house, and encouraged him to resume his place; promising him protection from the Pope, from the King his Master, and to spend fortie thousand dollars for his sustentation. And thus, partly by faire words abusing the impotencie, and partly by force compelling him, they wonne the weake man to yeeld: and then the French Em- L bassadour sent his Interpreters and Ianizaries to re-seat him in the Cathedrall, and in Galata proclaimed him Patriarch, and threatened all those that would not obey and acknowledge him. An insolence full of proportion to the designe, to maintaine an ill cause by worse means.

But the Clergie and people knowing the vnlawfulnesse of this intrusion, and the vndue consecration, and foreseeing the ruine to come, if so pernitious example should preuaile, did still adhere to their old Pastor. Which the new better weighing in his owne retyrednesse, than in the French House, where his ambition was fomented; and fearing that if Cyrillus should recouer his iust right by the same way he had done his libertie, some greater disgrace or punishment might fall vpon him; without further consulting his high Protectour, in the night quitted the See, and came to his Patriach and cast himselfe into his mercy, asking ab- M solution; and vtterly renouncing French, Spanish, or Roman Factions, freely resigned. Herewith Cyrillus encouraged, by the strength of mony and friends was againe with the Letters of the Grand Seignior restored, in despight of the Enemie, who now found himselfe ouer-matched. But this strife did cost the Greekes threescore thousand Dollars, taken at Interest, almost

A almost to the destruction of the Church, especially to haue discouered to the Turkes a way to extort great summes by changes, from them, who formerly were esteemed poore Monks: which will neuer be forgotten, and finally ruine the See. This was the effect of pretended zeale to Religion, and a Romish charitie.

Now all men hoped for peace; but there brake out another storme. In Ianuarie following, a Coloyre was sent from Rome, called Archemandrita, and was receiued by the French into his house; who brought a promise from the Congregation de propaganda Fide, That notwithstanding the first faile for want of money, that now twenty thousand Dollars should be ready and returned thither; if they could make sure the deposition of Cyrillus, and place an obedient Sonne in his roome. To this end it was promised, that ten thousand Dollars, gi-B uen by a widow in France to charitable vses, should by the Popes authoritie be conuerted.
And thus new practises and new accusations were aduanced; but being timely discouered, they were preuented: yet againe it cost the poore Church a round summe of money.

The next yeare the persecution was calmed in outward appearance, but more subtile and close machinations supplied it: For it was then resolued in Rome, to corrupt Cyrillus, and so to winne him: then to discredit him with his friends, and to lay him open and vndo him.
To this purpose were sent from Rome about Februarie 1624, two seuerall Agents, one called Padre Berillus, to ingage the Patriarch in a practise with the Cossackes, which was treason: and a Iesuited Greeke bred in the Colledge at Rome, named Cannachi Rossi. To whom were giuen instructions vnder the hand and seale of Cardinall Bandini, to make ouerture C to Cyrillus of reconciliation, with great conditionall promises of supplies and this Com-helpe. But Sr. because you will best iudge of the scope of this negotiation, by the copy of mission, and from whence his hatred tooke root; I, that haue onely taken vpon me the part of a Relator, haue made it here a Parenthesis, and leaue your iudgement to collect your owne sence.

Instructions giuen to Cannachi Rossi.

1 HAuing neither brought me Letters from the Patriarch, nor from any other Prelate, we cannot giue an answer other than by word of mouth, conforming to the relation you haue deliuered.

2 The Church of Rome hath alwayes desired an vnion and peace with all other Churches, but especially with those of the East, (who haue heretofore so well merited of the Catholique Church) and not onely in antient times, but euen lately in the life of the Patriarch Hieromie, she hath done what she could possible, to assist and vnite the Greeke Church vnto her: not sparing therein either cost or labour: yea, to effect the same, she hath founded, and doth yet maintaine a Colledge of yong Greekes with her owne reuenue, to the end that that noble and ingenious Nation should flourish in godlinesse and learning, as in former ages it hath done.

3 Concerning the proposition of the present Patriarch, our Lord and Master the Pope (a Fauourer and Father of the Greeke Nation, as particularly your selfe haue knowne and seene) would disburse a round summe of money to re-unite so noble a Member to the Church of Rome, and assist in

A in particular that See, vpon which the rest of the Easterne Churches do depend. But considering the reports which haue been spread, and continually do come from Constantinople, of the Patriarch, wee do not see in what manner it can possibly be effected.

4 Concerning him, we are aduised, That he denieth the Inuocation of Saints, the Reall presence of Christ in the Eucharist, Free-will, the authority of Sacred Councels, Traditions, the authority of holy Fathers, the necessitie of Auricular Confession, and in it, the reuealing of secret sinnes: In stead of which he hath introduced a publique Confession made to God in generall words. That he sends yong men to study in the English and Germane Academies, where this Doctrine is taught and professed: that by their meanes he may spread it in the Leuant. And to this end, That hee hath caused to bee printed, and that he himselfe hath dispersed and giuen to some Bishops, certaine Catechismes full of B this and other like erroneous Doctrine, condemned long ago, not onely by the Apostolique See, and the Councell of Trent, but euen of his owne Predecessours, as he himselfe hath testified in that Confession of Faith which he left many yeares since in the hands of the Archbishop of Leopoli, acknowledging this and the like doctrine for heresie; and therefore concluding, That it was impossible, that the Greeke Church should euer vnite it selfe with the Protestants. And that in contemplation of the Hugonot Embassadours (with whom he doth freely conuerse) he hath taken away the * Sinodicon, and hath layed aside the reuerence due to the most holy Eucharist.

* It signifieth an Assembly t I take it to bee the power of Excommunication. But enquire how it is vsed by the Romish Church.

5 His Holinesse doth desire, That all these reports were false; and that he being the Head of so noble a Nation, should be such a one as the present condition, both in matters spirituall and temporall of the Flocke vnder his Iurisdiction doth require; that he might with a cheerefull countenance and C safe conscience extend his liberalitie and aid vnto him.

6 If these shall proue calumnies, and that the Patriarch doth thinke he can make his innocence appeare before his Holinesse, let him iustifie himselfe to the French or the Emperours Embassador: to whose relation (being persons of great vertue and authoritie) credit and faith will be giuen: and by their meanes let him send to his Sanctitie the confession of his Faith, in which he doth accept the Councell of Florence, and condemne the errours of Caluin and Luther, condemned alreadie by his Predecessours: And the Apostolique See will not be wanting in all fauour and assistance, to raise vp the Church of Constantinople, and all others on it depending.

7 That his Holinesse will not require either of him or the other Prelates of Greece, any conditions but such as were concluded and established in the sacred Florentine Councell; so that (according as the Grecian Church hath alway done) he condemne and anathematise the blasphemies of the D Septentrionall Heretiques; to say, of Caluinists, Lutherans, and such like. Rome, the xxj. of Februarie, 1625.

Cardinall Bandini.

The place of his Seale.

B This Cannachi Rossi became an vndertaker of his owne accord to merit of the Church of Rome, to conuert the Patriarch: who was amased at the boldnesse, and feared both wayes; either to answer, and so to bee ingaged in pen-warre; or bee silent, and condemned as standing mute. But at last he resolued, That seeing the Cardinall vouchsafed not to write directly to him, to take no notice, but to see how patience would deliuer him out of this snare. But the Iesuites content with no temper but present subscription, stirred vp some Bishops now made of their faction, anew to depose him; and there was offered twenty thousand dollars to establish one of them. This Tempest forced Cyrillus to retyre and hide, vntill his Friends had reuealed to the State the misterie of this forced practise, and opened the trechery of both of these Ministers, emploied only to introduce a change aduantagious to the Pope, and dangerous to the Grand Seigniour. Yet such is the custome of this Court, that his peace was againe bought at the expence of ten thousand dollars.

Once more the Patriarch expected peace & securitie; but the Congregation at Rome fel vpon a new counsel: First, better to fortifie themselues before they attempted their Enemies. And

And to this end, vpon diuers pretences, it was resolued to send hither an Anti-Patriarch from the Pope, qualified with absolute authoritie, but vnder the Title of Suffraganeo Apostolico, and with him a Treasurer for the Church (for Saint Peter durst not trust the French Embassadour with money) yet with these to ioyne him for his zeale, and countenance, and the Iesuites for their counsell. To this Triumvirate was giuen all power to plant, displant, to sow, and root out, and finally to do all things that might aduance the Roman Cause. For their better strength and abetting, it was also decreed to create new Romish Bishops in Smyrna, Naxia, and many Islands (a shift learned at Trent) to oppose the Greekes, and by aduantage of learning to supplant them. Of this mission there was great expectation.

About December, 1626, the Suffraganeo arriued at Naxia, whither the French Embassadour sent the Bishop of that place his Chapleine, and two Iesuites to receiue [illegible]: who conducted him as farre as Scio, where hee was accepted with great ceremonie. But beginning his office too roughly and too soone (for he should not haue declared himselfe vntill he had crept hither vnder the French wings, and had been settled by degrees) many tooke offence at this noueltie. The Lay-men feared some preiudice in the right of patronage ouer the Churches: the wisest foresaw the danger of Christian libertie, and that by their practises this innouation would inuolue all others into a suspition of some conspiracie: and if any scandall should from hence arise, the Turkes would not distinguish betwixt the guilty and the innocent, being in one liuerie by the name of Franke. Yea the Friers could not endure a power so neere, aboue them, but refused him lodging in their Conuents. The Greeke Clergie began euidently to discouer the subuersion of their authority, and antient Faith. Onely the Iesuits triumphed, and thought the prize now their owne. But desperation forced some, and charitie others to defend their possessions. Thus encouraged by strong friends to oppose this fatall blow, all the plot was opened to the Vizier, and their designe quietly and without scandall frustrated. The Suffraganeo retyred without noise; their new Bishops made by subreptitious Licences were imprisoned, their Letters of Priuiledge taken from them, to the extreame anguish and disgrace of their Protector. This last repulse made them furious; but Infestis animis deerat occasio.

In Iune, 1627, here arriued vpon an English Ship one Nicodemo Mataxa, a Coloyre borne in Cephalonia: he brought with him the Greeke stampe made at his expence, and diuers bookes printed in London, as he pretended for the benefit of his Nation, drowned almost in inuincible ignorance, especially for want of meanes to learne and study. As soone as hee came ashore, and had spoken with the Patriarch, and made knowne his zeale to that Church, he was from him by the Archbishop of Corinth recommended to the English Embassadour, to assist this pious intention, to passe these heauy commodities through the Custome-house without suspition. In which though he foresaw some trouble, yet he willingly vndertooke. But first consulting with Cyrillus of Constantinople, and Gelasius Patriarch of Alexandria, (then for his priuate affaires at the Port) and with the Resident of the Vnited Prouinces, he was of opinion, That in a matter of that nature, which was in it selfe honest and iustifiable, it was requisite to proceed openly and with leaue: which hauing obtained of the Vizier, hee tooke vp, and brought both stampe and bookes to his house. Now supposing all the difficultie had been ouercome, and neuer suspecting any scandall from Christians, for that which he thought did not, nor ought not to offend them, he gaue countenance and helpe to Mataxa to put his Industrie in order.

The Patriarch desired the Stampe might worke in the English House; but the Embassadour for priuate respects would not consent, but offered to take a house, and to giue both it and them his protection. Which he did, not farre from his owne, and neerer to the French Embassadours: who pretending the vnion of the two Churches, there appeared no feare of him, that he should enuy a Christian worke, or do any act that might separate them for euer. As soone as Mataxa was settled, and his print in order, the French and the Iesuites tooke offence, as set vp to publish bookes against the Church of Rome, or at least to take away their trade of teaching, and seducing children by his printing of Catechismes, Magna est Diana Ephesiorum. First, they attempted to draw him into their gouernment, inuiting him to their Monasterie; intimating, That adhering to them would take off some ill suspition raised on him for hauing studied in England. When he could not be wonne by flatteries, they reported him him to be an Heretique and a Lutheran, because he tooke sanctuarie from the English. Against the stampe they excepted, at the Armes of the King of Great Britaine, which they sayd was scandalous, and beeing in the Frontispiece of euerie booke, was malum augurium, and did foreshew, that within they must sauor of heresie: for, What could be expected from an hereticall Fountaine, or from the Man that conuersed with Heretiques.

These obloquies little moued the English Embassadour, who knew their malice proceeded from the matter of one Authour that wrote against the Supremacie. But the rage extended so farre, that it was reuealed to Mataxa, That hee should be murthered in his bed, or in the street, as he passed in the night from the English to his owne house. Whereupon at his great instance the Embassador was content for his person to giue him lodging. So in the day he continued his worke, and at euening retyred vnder protection. Meleſim, Pol. Alex.

As yet they found no occasion to worke their purpose: but the Patriarch sent a little Treatise to the Presse, made by himselfe (being an exposition of the Faith, and Tenents of the Greeke Church, without any mention of Controuersie, or censuring the opinions of others; principally to satisfie the world in those calumnies spred, That hee had introduced new doctrines, to the scandall of his owne Flocke) which he had resolued to dedicate to the King of England; but now hauing opportunitie to print it here, he prepared an Epistle fit for it. This prouoked the Iesuites, who not able to endure any application of the East Church to that Monarch, could no longer containe themselues, but conspired with their Embassadours to ouerthrow both the Authour, Worke, and Workman: and hauing gotten another Booke written by the Patriarch, printed in England, and brought by Mataxa against the Iewes, they found some passages which did modestly condemne the opinions of the Turkes. When they had this supposed aduantage, they practised with a Buffone, but a crafty knaue, who had credit with the Vizier, and had been Vayuod of Galata, to informe him, That this Mataxa was a Captaine sent hither to raise sedition, and that vnder the colour of printing books for children, he dispersed others against the Alcaron; That they were brought from England secretly, and that the English Embassadour protected him and his designes: That these books were written by the Patriarch, to stirre the Greekes, and to draw them into defection; and many of them sent to the Cossacks, to prouoke them to vnite vpon the occasion of the Grand Seigniors expedition into Asia, that was then rumored.

These Accusations were capitall, as they concerned Cyrillus and Mataxa; and sufficient to impaire the credit of the English Embassadour, if not to ruine him in the affaires for which he did reside.

The Vizier without further consideration resolued to assault the house of Mataxa, and surprise him in the act of sinne of printing against their Law; and gaue order to a Captaine and companie of Ianizaries to execute it. Which was out of course, to set at libertie vnruly Souldiers, that seldome containe themselues within their Order, or can be appeased without booty. The exployt should haue been done on Friday the fourth of Ianuarie: but the French Embassadour hearing the English had inuited the Patriarch, and Venetian Baylo, to some entertainment on the day of Epiphany, he stayed it two dayes, as he said, to make sauce to their Feast. On that day at high noone, a hundred and fifty Ianizaries armed beset Mataxa's house, & garded all the passages to the English: all was full of feares & rumor, and no man knew the cause. In this tumult, the English Embassadors Secretarie & Mataxa returning from church at Galata, passed by; and some of the Coloyres Seruants that were apprehended, shewed their Master, to free themselues: but he being in a hat, and the Secretarie answering hee was one of his Lords Followers, he escaped safely, and got into the English house. The Captaine missing him the Principall, bound all his Seruants, brake open his chests, and carried all away, stampe, bookes, papers, plate, money, cloathes, and whatsoeuer was portable, as the goods of a Traitor, to the value of seuen thousand Dollars. And returning thus full, a French * Drogaman told them, That the Offendor was fled to the English Embassador: but the Turke, that had more charitie, answered, he had no order to follow him thither.

* Interpreter.

Now the English Embassadour thought himselfe interessed; yet that day not to seeme to be moued, made as merrie as such rumours would beare, That hee had practised against the State; others, That the Stampe was to counterfeit the Grands Letters; others, To make false money; and other such as Ignorance and Accusation beget among the Multitude.

And the Vizier had called to minde the man, and all circumstances, and remembred concerned, (the English Embassadour, with whom he had confidence) he precipitation; and protested he had no doubt of him, nor purpose to af-He wondered at the impudence of those that had so grossely abused him; with this profession (as the English Embassadour for his credit did publish) against as will he had done him wrong, when he should see all the goods of restored, their honour repaired, and those that had procured this scandall, fallen into the ditch they had made for others, and exemplarily punished, then he desired to be acquitted of iniustice, and to be esteemed still his true friend. By this office the Patriarch was wholly cleered, and restored to the good opinion of the Vizier, and after of the Mufti; to whom the English went immediately, to instruct him of the malice of the one part, and innocencie of the other.

The next day after the fury, Cannachi Rossi the Agent of Cardinall Bandini, went to the Pa-to braue him in aduersitie: who asking him, How long they would tempt his patience by wicked conspiracies? and What had driuen them to this extremitie to seeke his life? he replied, That they were scandalised at him for two things; For fauouring Mataxa, and suffering him to preach, being an Heretique, and liuing in the house of an Heretique.
Secondly, That he had begun to print a booke full of heresies, dedicated to the King of England the Head of Heretiques. But if he would retract the one, and renounce the other, that the French Embassadour should procure his accommodation.

With the next Post after this trouble, there came from Rome a copie of a Consistorie, held in the house of Cardinall Bandini, entituled for Constantinople; wherein this practise against the Patriarch was debated and resolued: the cause grounded vpon his conuersation with Caluinists, and sending of Students to be brought vp in their Schooles; that therefore he should be accused of contriuing an insurrection against the Ottoman Empire: And the execution of this plot commended to the Embassadours of the Potentates residing in this court, fauourers of the Catholique Cause. Which Councell being compared with the last practise, it did euidently appeare, that one was dependant on the other. Which the Patriarch well considering, and finding he had no more safetie in patience, resolued to vse his Friends to send

A send them away that would not let him liue in peace. And the English Embassadour taking deepe offence at the insolence of Cannachi Rossi, vsed to the name of his King; it is thought that they, together with the helpe of a good Friend no lesse powerfull than either of them, vnited to banish the Iesuites; and to shew their Protector, that they had not lesse power to offend, because they had lesse malice and desire to do it.

For the way they wrought (to omit other obseruеable circumstances) it is true, the English Embassador was angry, and declared, and had good credit, and was seene often abroad; but he was not alone, for the Patriarch (that is a wise man) knew he striued not now for victorie, but for life. The Iesuites guilty of deseruing a iust reuenge, retyred all to the French Embassadors house, where they lay hid about fourteene dayes; but in that time hearing no
B noise, and hoping that all was secure, and that the Patriarch and English Embassador trauelled onely in their defence, and to recouer their losses, they returned to their house triumphant; when suddenly we heard that a Messenger came to them, to let them know that some Greeke women were come to make confession, and stayed for them in their garden. To whom two of them came downe, and were presently arrested by the Viziers Officers, who then entered their Lodgings, and apprehended another. This was done without any noyse or scandall; and the Actors had such care, that their Church was sealed, all their Altars and plate saued, and whatsoeuer appertained to them inuiolated: onely their persons and Librarie, per Legem Talionis, were carried to the Viziers house, where they were kept in irons about a moneth, and their bookes likewise visited; in which were found much more aduan-
C tage to haue drawne them within compasse of the Turkish Law, than their discouerie on the Patriarch. At the same instant Cannachi Rossi was also taken, and his papers in his Lodging, and carried to beare them sad company. The French Embassadour desired audience, but could not obtaine it; he visited euery great mans port, especially the Mufti, where hee had no other acceptance than admonition to carry himselfe with more temper, and to meddle with the businesse for which he was employed. He vsed all means, but could no where preuaile for reliefe; he threatened a breach of amitie, and to surrender his Capitulations, and interdicted the Traffique: But the Turkes were prouided with answers, That they would informe his Master the French King, and giue him satisfaction. In conclusion, the Iesuites wearie, and in feare of death (for there was crime enough) they whom they supposed their D Enemies, to auoid scandall, and the effusion of Christian bloud, interposed for them, and obtained their liues; and after many consultations, it was agreed to banish their Order out of all the Grand Seigniours Dominions, to deliuer backe their bookes; and this grace at the intercession of those of whom they had not merited that courtesie: that it might cleerely appeare there was no purpose of robberie, nor to take the goods that were innocent, and in the French Kings protection. In prosecution of which Councell, there were Commands sent to Scio, Smyrna, Aleppo, and Cyprus, to discharge those places from the practises of this Fraternitie, who had a designe to get the Sepulchre at Ierusalem into their hands, and to supplant the Franciscans: (which Controuersie is well knowne at Rome, and would make a long Section in this narration) and finally they were put into a Barque, with good gard, in their
E yrons, and sent to Scio; with order to ship them and their fellowes vpon the next vessel that went for Christendome, and in the meane time to keepe them prisoners. When they came to the Castles on the Hellespont, the French Embassador had procured, that the Castellane would not suffer them to passe for want of the Captaine Bassa's Letter; and so they were returned to Constantinople, but still kept in their gaole; and suddenly it was rumoured, they were reuoked, and should be re-established. But when the Vizier heard his authoritie was contemned, and this tricke put vpon him, he was so much enraged, that againe their liues were in danger. But the present fury appeased euen by their supposed Enemies, they were F liques, especially the Orders of Friers, and the Franciscans of Ierusalem, were glad they were returned, banished first to Scio, and so shipped for Italy. I must confesse, that I haue not obserued any one sorte but the French Embassadour, scarce his Houshold; all other Cathoeased of their dominion, and the feares of their designes. And I haue heard it reported, That themselues did ingeniously confesse an obligation to the English Embassadour; and in their Relations to Rome, layed all the fault vpon the precipitation of their Protector.

There was another Command sent to Smyrna, to apprehend a couple that had crept in vnder vnder the French Consuls protection: who at first hid themselues; but being aduised to giue G open, diuers meanes opened to them to escape, fled secretly; there being no other purpose in their petitions, but to be rid of such negotiating Fathers.

And thus Sr. you haue a true relation of what I haue obserued, and for your satisfaction collected of those that had better meanes to know particulars than I, who am busie enough if I do mine owne businesse. There rests onely to tell you, That during the English Embassadors stay, which was about fiue moneths after, the French sat downe and stirred not: but considering that his credit in France depended much from Rome, and from an opinion of his
H zeale to the Catholique Cause, and his power to support it; hauing made the Cardinals beleeue, that he would subdue the Greeke Church (wherein wisemen thought he did disseruice both to the Cause and his Master: For the readie way to vnderstand Catholiques, was to innouate any thing in their antient manner of life, gouernment, priuiledges which they enioyed with their consciences freely) he thought himself vtterly lost, it he did not do somewhat to recouer his reputation there, by procuring restitution of the Iesuites. Vpon which deliberation, hauing yet two of them remaining in his house, and hid there
I a moneth after the departure of the English Embassadour, he made petition to the Grand Seignior, That his Chapleines might haue leaue to bury his dead, and doe other offices of their Function. Which being granted, it was published, That he had restored the Iesuites.

And because you are so curious to know all, and in what estate that restitution now stands, I will conclude with the true copy of the Command obtained: and leaue it to your iudgement, whether the breach be made vp so whole as is supposed. For euery plaister is not a sound cure.

The Grand Seigniours Command, directed to Assan Bassa, Captaine of the Sea; and to the Caddee of Galata.

K AT the sight of this our high and Imperiall Signature you shall take notice, That the Embassadour of France (by an * Arz giuen to our happy Port) hath made vs to vnderstand, That (their Law and Religion being not like to that of other Christians which liue in our well gouerned Empire) they with our Imperiall Licence did procure to come from the Kingdome of France certaine Religious men called Iesuites. Who for the space of twenty fiue yeares haue had their abode in the Church of Saint Benet appointed for them in Galata; and lately by finister information made against them, were sent away into their owne Country: from whence the said Church being shut vp, and hauing no
L other Religious who could assist in the necessarie offices of men ready to die, or dead; hath therefore petitioned for our noble Command. To which end (excepting alway the aboue named * Religious, sent away, and others, of other Nations) that hee may place in the said Church such persons of Religious French, and French Religion, which are found at this present here, elect, and appointed by him, without molestation or iniury to be done vnto them by any whomsoeuer. Therefore in conformity to his request, this my Command is obtained; and I doe command, That at the sight of this my Imperiall Order, it be obeyed and executed; That because, as is before pretended, the French haue not those * Religious who can performe the functions necessary for the dead (excepting away those Religious M already banished, and all others comming from the countries of our Enemies) that they may put into the said Church such persons for Religious men, as are naturall Frenchmen, and of their owne profession, which at present are found in Galata, and that shall by them be appointed;

* Petition.

* In the originall it signifies an Order.

* Or Orders.

A ted; and that so long as they commit no faults in their charge, and that they practise nothing contrary to our Imperiall will, that they be of no man molested.

Vpon the obtaining this Command, the two Iesuites in the French House, were solemnly and with great ostentation carried to San Benetto's Church, and placed there as the Embassadours Chapleines; and an opinion spred, of an absolute re-establishment of their Order, and so it was diuulged in Rome. But it was not supposed by the French, that this Copy should be seene by any but himselfe; and then the Act would haue appeared as truth: but some critical and captious men here haue made many Quære's vpon this matter. First they haue asked, What then is the French Religion, if it differ from all other Christians in the Grand Seigniours Dominions; when in Galata there are fiue Romish Churches and Monasteries, with French Capuchins, Dominicans, Franciscans, and others? Secondly they haue asked, What ceremonies are necessarie to a French man, in danger of death, or after it, that none of these Orders can assist or performe? Againe they aske, Who are restored by this priuiledge, if the Religiosi supra nominati, and Strangers are excepted? What is meant by French Religion, and the same Religion? To which is answered, First, that this new French Religion is onely Iesuiticall, not approued by the most Christian King, improued by the Sorbons, and reproued by all the louers of the liberty of the Gallican Church. To the second, That they dying must be absolued onely by a Iesuite, or buried in his habit, or shut out of Paradice. A-C gaine they answer, they finde none restored but a new French Religion, and such men were personally then in Galata; that is, two Chapleines onely to assist in case of death, but no Order of Iesuites. And they finally conclude, That the French Embassadour hath more dishonoured his Nation, to restraine their Religion to the Iesuites; and to the whole Clergy, to renounce all other Orders; than he hath done benefit to the Iesuites, except he had need of some colour in stead of truth.

Sr. I will not comment at all; to obey you, I haue gone thus farre extra prouinciam meam: And now I returne home to my selfe, to assure you, that I haue beene, and will so die,

Your true, &c.

D Galata ix. Nouembr. 1628.

This Trage-Comedie being ended, and a seeming Peace returning with the Spring: Whilest the new Vizier marched towards Babylon, to settle the affaires of those parts; Sir Thomas Roe, then his Maiesties Embassadour resident at the Port, procured His leaue to returne home, and was recalled: by whom the Grand Seignior writ this ensuing Letter to his Maiestie of Great Britaine.

The Grand Seigniours Letter to his Maiestie of Great Britaine.

F Grace and Authoritie, CHARLES, King of Great Britaine and Ireland; to whose last dayes we wish all compleat and true happinesse.

BE it knowne vnto your Maiestie at the sight of this Letter, That your Embassador Sir Thomas Roe, respected and beloued amongst Christians, to whom we wish a happy end;

vnder the French Consuls protection: who at first hid themselues; but being aduised to giue G place, and a meanes opened to them to escape, fled secretly; there being no other purpose in their persecutors, but to be rid of such negotiating Fathers.

And thus Sr. you haue a true relation of what I haue obserued, and for your satisfaction collected of those that had better meanes to know particulars than I, who am busie enough if I do mine owne businesse. There rests only to tell you, That during the English Embassadors stay, which was about fiue moneths after, the French lat downe and stirred not: but considering that his credit in France depended much from Rome, and from an opinion of his zeale to the Catholique Cause, and his power to support it; hauing made the Cardinals beleeue, that he would subdue the Greeke Church (wherein without [illegible] did dissernice both to the Cause and his Master: For the readie way to vniuersalities, was to innouate any thing in their ancient manner of life, [illegible] priuiledges which they enioyed with their consciences freely: [illegible] he did not do somewhat to recouer his reputation there, by [illegible] ites. the History of [illegible]

h of August, about ten [illegible] becalmed before Malta, the seas smooth [illegible] K foure gallies to row from the Towne. They [illegible] quarter of our Ship: which warned vs to fit sailes and selues to [illegible] pose. When they came neere, the Admirall galley, without sen[illegible] vs, made a shot, which fell short: then rowing neerer, made another which [illegible] vs. And comming still on, the Vice-Admirall gaue a third, all demy-cannon, [illegible] masts. These we supposed they made to try the length of their ordnance, [illegible] for batterie; for they stopped, and piked halfe their oares. Whereupon we [illegible] a culuerin shot, that graued vnder the Admirals starre-boord bow; and so we began a sharpe fight betweene two[illegible]e. The Gallies were full of Caualiero's and other men as they could stand: they lay on that quarter about three houres, changing L shot with vs, often hitting one the other. Then Captaine William Rainsborow (who behaued himselfe with braue courage and temper) finding a breath of winde to giue the Ship motion; considering that he was a great marke on the broad side, and the gallies very narrow, keeping their prowes sharpe toward him, and that he could beare little vpon them, trimmed his sailes before the winde, and brought them to a sterne-fight; where they continued their batterie two houres more; and the Sampson could then beare vpon them two whole culuerin in her Sterne-chase, and two transome culuerins in the Gunne-roome, and two Sakers in the great Cabbin; and by yawing of either side both her quarters, and some pieces forward on; this gauled them, and they found it hot. Their manner of fight was, when they were all laden, they rowed vp, and brought all the masts of our ship together, and then gaue all their M gunne[illegible]auing fired, they fell asterne; and this in order, alternis vicibus: but yet we reached them [illegible] Admirall of the gallies gaue eight pieces at on[illegible] so that she appeared all fire; one de[illegible]mon of twenty fiue pound bullet, two demi-culuerin, fiue Saker and Minion. All the rest v[illegible]like armed, and they plyed their ordnance very hard, and often dangerously.

Being

A ted; and that so [illegible] they shot a[illegible] yards of our Ship, and maimed them almost [illegible] hoping [illegible] to boord vs, and then they had layn by vs. But it was so calme, that [illegible] not, though [illegible] almost spoiled. The gallies helpt a man on the end [illegible] oare to obserue where their shot fell; and sent boats often off, of which one returned well washed. About fiue a clocke they pausd, and the Admirall sent to his fleet: whereupon they tooke a resolution, either to boord, dismay, or sinke vs; and came vp on our larboord quarter all abreast, within pistoll shot, and their swords drawne, and Trumpets sounding; bidding vs Amaine for Malta. The Captaine caused one from the poope to waft them aboord, and answered a point of warre. Then began a hot fight, and too hot for them; for the Sampson forbare, and gaue them not a shot vntill they were very neere, and almost vnder vs; and then poured in two Culuerin, and two demy-culuerin, and one Saker B with a round shot and a case, that raked them fore and aft: and they hauing giuen vs all their gunnes together, began to fall againe asterne. But we tasked and sent them a broad side at parting; and so they lay, and reviewed their sterne batterie vntill Sun-set. What blowes wee receiued is in a note following. What harm the Enemie receiued we knew not: only this we saw, the Admirals foremast was shot by boord, his poope carried away into the sea; one culuerin round shot and case that fell in the bow, and went out in the quarter through the bankes of Rowers; and many other that raked them through. The Admirall lay athwart a good space to mend somewhat, and let men downe her sides, and neuer came more vp: for that shot that brake out her poupe, made them all at once take in their flagges; which being an vnusuall thing, we coniectured that the Generall was slaine. And so they left vs, and hoysing C their sailes, and rowing, made all haste into their port, in sight whereof they fought. The last shot they made came into the gun-roome of the Sampson, the force being spent, yet hurt three men: and she hauing a Culuerin laden, sent it to take leaue of them, which raked the Admirall. When they came vp with vs, they did not expect such bullets, but hoped to batter vs to the water out of our shot. They left vs at halfe houre past six a clocke; so that the fight lasted seuen houres. The gallies gaue the Sampson foure hundred great shot, and hit her in the hull, masts, yards, or rigging, with more than a hundred and twenty; and we shot fifty six whole Culuerin, and spent in all aboue ten barrels of pouder. Neuer gallies had so much aduantage of a time, nor did so brauely, but they were at their owne dores. By Gods grace we D had but one man a passenger slaine, foure hurt, and some bruised; but our ship terribly battered, her masts, yards, sailes, and ropes all torne. That night continued with little wind, and the sea smooth, and we plugged vp our wounds the best we could. The next day wee were enforced to stand out of the way to the Southward of the Island Lampadosa, when we found our danger: and there we lay fiue days without saile, to fish our masts & yards, and mend our sailes, and to make firme our breaches by, and vnder water. Which we could not haue done if it had not continued calme: for those demy-cannon bullets of twenty fiue pounds made too great holes, and split all plankes and timbers; and the Carpenter was forced to hang like a Tortoise vpon the water, and driue many nailes vnder the sending of the sea, washing him ouer contiuually; eight shot either with, or within three fingers of the water. So that if that E night, or the next day there had been any sea, we had neuer made this relation; for the pumps of our ship were as well exercised as the men. But God helped vs.

A briefe Discourse of the greatnesse of the Turkish Empire: as also wherein the greatest strength thereof consisteth; and of what power the bordering Princes, as well Mahometans as Christians, are in comparison of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

THe Historie of the Turkes (being indeed nothing else but the true record of the woefull ruines of the greater part of the Christian commonweale) things as before passed through, and at length brought to an end; and their Empire (of all others now vpon earth farre the greatest) as a proud Champion still standing vp as it were in defiance of the whole world: I thought it good for the conclusion of this my Labour, to propose vnto the view of the zealous Christian, the greatnesse thereof; and so neere as
C I could to set downe the bounds and limits within the which it is (by the goodnesse of God) as yet contained, together with the strength and power thereof, ■ also in what regard it hath the neighbor princes bordering or confining vpon it, with some other particularities tending vnto the same purpose. All or most part thereof, although it be by the considerate well to be gathered out of the whole course of the Historie before going, yet shall it more plainely here together in the full thereof appeare, than by the long and particular consideration of the rising and encrease thereof be perceiued: not much vnlike the ouergrowne tree, at the greatnesse whereof euery man wondereth, no man in the mean time either perceiuing or marking how by little and little in tract of time it grew vp to that biggenesse, as now to D ouertop all the rest of the wood. The Imperiall seat of this so great and dreadfull an empire, is the most famous city of Constantinople, sometime the glory of the Greeke Empire, but now the place where Achmat the first of that name, and fourteenth of the Othoman Emperors, acknowledging no man like vnto himselfe, triumpheth ouer many Nations: a city fatally founded to command, and by the great Conqueror Tamerlane, of all others thought to be the best seated for the Empire of the world. In which city (taken from the Christians by Mahomet the second, by the Turks syrnamed the Great, and the Greeke Empire by him subuerted) as the Othoman Emperors haue euer since seated themselues, so haue they wonderfully, euen to the astonishment of the world, out of the ruines of that so glorious a State encreased both their strength and Empire, almost altogether fixed euen in the selfe same Kingdomes, E countries, and regions, as was sometimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attaine to the vttermost bounds that that Empire sometimes had, especially in Europe; albeit that it hath oftentimes in pride thereof most mightily swolne, & in some few places thereof somewhat also exceeded the same. Amongst the rest of the Othoman Emperors, this great Monarch of whom we speake (namely Achmat the first, which now raigneth in that most stately and Imperiall city) hath at this present vnder his command and Empire, the chiefe and most fruitfull parts of the three first knowne parts of the world: onely America remaining free from him, not more happy with the rich mines thereof, than in that it is so far from out of his reach. For in Europe he hath all the sea coast from the confines of Epidaurus (the vttermost bound of his Empire in Europe Westward) vnto the mouth of the riuer Tanais, now F called Don, with whatsoeuer lieth betwixt Buda in Hungarie, and the Imperiall Citie of Constantinople: in which space is comprehended the better part of Hungarie, all Bosna, Seruia, Bulgaria, with a great part of Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedonia, Grecia, Peloponesus, Thracia, the Archipelago, with the rich Islands contained therein. In Affrica hee possesseth all thereby he gaineth two great commodities: viz. for that in so doing he spoyleth the prouinces he most feareth, of the flower, fines, and strength of the people, choice being still made of the strongest youths, and fittest for war: then, for that with these as with his owne creatures he armeth himselfe, and by them assureth his state; for they in their childehood taken from their parents lap, and deliuered in charge to one or other appointed for that purpose, quickely and before they be aware become Mahometans; and so no more acknowledge father or mother, depend wholly on the great Sultan; who to make vse of them, both feeds them and fosters them, at whose hands only they looke for all things, and whom alone they thanke for all. Of which fry so taken from their Christian parents (the only seminaric of his wars) some become horsemen, some footmen, and so in time the greatest commanders of his state and empire next vnto himselfe; the naturall Turkes in the meane time giuing themB selues wholly vnto the trade of merchandise, and other their mechanicall occupations; or else to the feeding of cattell, their most antient and naturall vocation, not intermedling at all with matters of gouernment or state. So that if vnto these his souldiers, all of the Christian race, you ioyne also his fleet and mony, you haue as it were the whole strength of his empire: for in these foure, his horsemen, his footmen, his fleet and money, especially consisteth his great force and power: whereof to speake more particularly, and first concerning his mony, it is commonly thought, that his ordinary reuenue exceedeth not eight millions of gold: and albeit that it might seeme, that hee might of so large an empire receiue a far greater reuenue, yet doth he not, for that both he and his men of warre (in whose power all things are) haue their greatest and almost onely care vpon armes, fitter by nature to wast and destroy countC tries, than to preserue and inrich them: insomuch that for the preseruation of their armies, and furtherance of their expeditions (euery yeare to do) they most grieuously spoyle euen their owne people and prouinces whereby they passe, scarce leauing them necessaries wherewith to liue: so that the subiects dispairing to enioy the fruits of the earth, much lesse the riches which by their industrie and labour they might get vnto themselues, do now no further endeauour themselues either to husbandrie or traffique than they needs must, yea, than very necessity it selfe inforceth them. For to what end auaileth it to sow that another man must reape? or to reape that which another man is ready to deuoure? Whereupon it commeth, that in the territories of the Othoman country, yea euen in the most fruitfull countries of Macedonia and Greece are seen great forests, all euery where wast, few cities well peopled; D and the greatest part of those countries lying desolate and desart: so that husbandry (in all well ordered commonweales the Princes greatest store) decaying, the earth neither yeeldeth her encrease vnto the painfull husbandman, neither he matter vnto the artificer, neither the artificer wares to furnish the merchant with, all together with the plough running into ruine and decay. As for the trade of merchandise, it is almost all in the hands of the Iewes, or the Christians of Europe, viz. the Ragusians, Venetians, Genowaies, French, or English; the naturall Turks hauing therein the least to do, holding in that their so large an empire no other famous cities for trade, more than the foure aboue named, viz. Constantinople, Tauris, Aleppo, and Caire: whereunto may be added Caffa and Thessalonica in Europe; Damascus, Tripolis, and Aden in Asia; Alexandria and Algiers in Affricke. In our countries here in this E West part of Europe, of the aboundance of people oftentimes ariseth dearth; but in many parts of the Turks dominions, for want of men to manure the ground: most part of the poore country people drawne from their owne dwellings, being inforced with victuals and other necessaries to follow their great armies in their long expeditions, of whom scarce one of ten euer returne home to their dwellings againe, there by the way perishing, if not by the enemies sword, yet by the wants, the intemperateneſse of the aire, or immoderate paines taking. But to come neerer vnto our purpose, although the great Turks ordinary reuenues be no greater than is aforesaid, yet are his extraordinary escheats to be greatly accounted of, especially F his confiscations, forfeitures, fines, amerciaments (which are right many) his tributes, customs, tythes and tenths of all preyes taken by sea or land, with diuers other such like, far exceeding his standing and certaine reuenue: his Bassa's and other his great officers like rauening Harpies as it were sucking out the bloud of his poore subiects, and heaping vp inestimable treasures, which for the most part fall againe into the grand Seignior his coffers. Ibrahim Vizier Bassa ſtantine the Great alſo gaue vnto his Captaines that had well deſerued of him, certaine lands for them to liue vpon during the terme of their life. The like fees in France, which they called Feuda, were of temporaries made perpetuities by theſe their late Kings. Theſe Timariot horſemen in the Turkiſh Empire, ſerue to two great and moſt notable purpoſes: whereof the firſt is, That by them the Grand Seigniour, as with a bridle, keepeth the reſt of his ſubiects in euery part of his great Empire in awe, ſo that they cannot ſo ſoone moue, but that they ſhall haue theſe his Timariots as faulcons in their neckes; for to that purpoſe they are diſperſed all ouer his dominion and Empire. The other vſe of them (and no leſſe profitable than the former) is, for that out of them he is alwayes able to draw into the field an hundred and fifty thouſand horſemen well armed, ready to go whither ſoeuer he ſhall command them; with all whom he is not at one farthing charge. Which ſo great a power of horſemen cannot continually be maintained for leſſe than fourteene millions of duckets yearely. Wherefore it is to be maruelled, that ſome comparing the Turkes reuenues with the Chriſtians, make no mention of this ſo great a part of the Othoman Emperours wealth & ſtrength, ſeruing him firſt for the ſuppreſſing of all ſuch tumults as might ariſe in his Empire, and then as a moſt principall ſtrength of his continuall warres, alwayes ready to ſerue him in his greateſt expeditions. The number of theſe Timariot horſemen is now growne very great, taking encreaſe together with the Turkes Empire. It is reported, That Amurath the third, grandfather to Achmat that now reigneth, in his late warres againſt the Perſian, ſubdued ſo much territorie as ſerued him to erect therein fortie thouſand Timariots: and appointed at Tauris a new receit which was yearely worth vnto him a million of gold. Theſe Timariots are in all accounted to be ſeuen hundred and nineteene thouſand fighting men; of whom two hundred and fifty ſeuen thouſand haue their aboad and dwelling in Europe, and foure hundred ſixtie two thouſand in Aſia and Affricke. Beſide theſe Timariots, the grand Seigniour had a great number of other horſemen alſo, vnto whom he giueth pay; which are his Spahi, Vlufagi, and Carapici of his Court, being indeed the nurſeries and ſeminaries of the great Officers and gouernors of his empire: for from among them are ordinarily choſen the Sanzacks, which afterwards, through their good deſerts, or the Sultans great fauor, become Viziers, Beglerbegs, and Baſſa's, the chiefe Rulers of that ſo mighty a monarchie. He hath alſo ſtill in his army a great multitude of other horſemen called Acanzij, being indeed but rurall elownes, yet for certaine priuiledges which they haue are bound to go vnto the warres, being euen of the Turks themſelues accounted of ſmall worth or value in compariſon of the Timariots. He receiueth great aid alſo from the Tartar in his wars, as alſo from the Valachians and Moldauians, (vntill that now of late by the example of the Tranſyluanians, they liaue to the great benefit of the reſt of the Chriſtian commonweale reuolted from him) all which are to be accounted as the Romans Auxiliarij, that is to ſay, ſuch as come to aid and aſſiſt him. And thus much for his horſemen.

Another great part of his ſtrength conſiſteth in his footmen, and eſpecially in his Ianizaries: in whom two things are to be conſidered, their Nation, and Dexteritie in armes. Concerning their Nation, ſuch of the Azamoglans as are borne in Aſia are not ordinarily inrolled in the number of the Ianizaries, but ſuch as are borne in Europe; for they of Aſia are accounted more effeminate, as they haue been alwaies, more ready to fly than to fight: whereas the people of Europe haue euen in the Eaſt been accounted for better and more valiant ſouldiers, hauing there, to their immortall glorie, ſet vp the notable trophies of their moſt glorious victories. The ſouldiers of Aſia be called Turkes, after the name of their nation, and not of their countrey, (no countrey being indeed ſo properly called) and they of Europe, Rumi, that is to ſay, Romani, or Romans; as the countrey, eſpecially about Conſtantinople, is called by the name of Rum-Ili, that is, the Roman countrey, as it was in antient time, of the notable Roman Colonies therein, knowne by the name of Romania. Now as concerning their Dexteritie, ſuch male children are culled out from the Chriſtians, as in whom appeareth the greateſt ſignes of ſtrength, actiuitie, and courage: for theſe three qualities are in a ſouldier eſpecially required. This choice is made euery third yeare, except neceſſitie enforce it to be made ſooner, as it happened in the late Perſian warre: wherein not onely oftener choice was made, but they were glad to vſe the Azamoglans alſo, a thing neuer before by them done: for thoſe youths, the children of Chriſtian parents, being by them that haue taken them vp

When many children are taken vp to make Ianizaries of.

The Azamoglans are ſuch vntrained youths as are taken vp to become Ianizaries, but yet are not of their Order.

Bassa (who liued not long since) is supposed to haue brought him from Caire to the va- C lue of six millions: and Mahomet another of the Viziers is thought to haue had a far greater summe. His presents also amount vnto a great matter, for no Embassador can come before him without great gifts, no man is to hope for any commodious office or preferment without mony, no man may with empty hands come to the presence of him so great a either from the prouince he had the charge of, or from any great expedition he was on; neither vnto so great and mighty a Prince are mens affections reconciled. The Waiuods of dania, Valachia, and Transyluania, before their late reuolt by gifts presented themse their principalities, being almost daily changed especially in Valachia and Moldauia those Honors were by the grand Seignior still giuen to those that would giue most, and performe what they had offered; miserably oppressing the people, and brought many places into great pouerty. In briefe, no enterprise can be attempted of any great matter from him at his pleasure to take away any mans life, or of his goods, for they are so so that he cannot well be said to lacke a cause, if he list to vse extremitie. And are the Ianizaries the late Sultan was so compelled [illegible] to keep them exhausted his treasure, that all coine comming then [illegible] as their ex-pences so much that they [illegible] together in large troupes, three also the religious [illegible] and throfs attending, without whose Ianizaries go not vpon their iourneys. There they learne so shoot both in the Bow and [illegible] with many feats of activitie: and being well trained in those [illegible] amongst the Ianizaries or Spahi; of whom, the Ianizaries receiue not [illegible] more than eight for their daily pay, and the Spahi ten. Being [illegible] among the Ianizaries, they are either sent away into the wars, or into some gar[illegible] or else remain there still. These last haue for their dwelling three great places like vnto Monasteries in the city of Constantinople, there they liue vnder their gouernours to whom they are deuoted, the yonger with great obedience and silence seruing the elder, in buying of things for them, in dressing their meat, and such like seruices. They that [illegible] of one [illegible] stalling liue together at one table, and sleepe in long walkes. If any of them vpon occasion or violence to lie all night abroad without leaue, the next euening he is notably beaten, with such nurture and discipline, that after his beating he like an Ape kisseth the gouernours hands that so corrected him. These Ianizaries haue many large priuiledges, are honored, although they be most insolent, and are feared of all men, yea euen of the great Sultan himselfe, who is still glad to make faire weather with them. In their expeditions or trauell they rob the poore Christians cottages and houses, who must not say one word to the contrarie.
When they buy any thing they giue for it but what they list themselues: they can be iudged by none but their Aga, neither can they be executed without danger of an insurrection; and therefore such execution is seldome done, and that very secretly. They haue a thousand roisters: some of them are appointed to the keeping of Embassadors sent from forrein princes: others some of them are assigned to accompany strangers, trauellers, especially them that be [illegible] they may safely passe in the Turks dominions; for which [illegible] rewarded. The [illegible] made choice of their Prince, namely of Solymus the first, [illegible]ther Bajazet yet liuing; neither can any the Turkes Sultans account themselues fully inuested in the Imperial dignity, or assured of their estate, vntill they be by them approued and proclaimed. Euerie one of their Sultans at his first comming to the Empire doth giue them some great largesse, and sometime the better to please them, encreaseth also their pay. In euery great expedition some of them goeth forth with their Aga, or his Lieutenant, and are the last of all that fight. There is no office among the Turkes that moe enuie at, than at the office of the Aga of the Ianizaries, for the greatnesse of his authoritie and command: onely hee and the Beglerbeg of Grecia chuse not their owne Lieutenant, but haue them nominated vnto them by the Grand Seignior. Vnto this great man the Aga of the Ianizaries, nothing can portend a more certaine destruction, than to be M of them beloued; for then is hee of the Great Sultan straightway feared or mistrusted, and so occasion sought for to take him out of the way. The number of the Ianizaries of the Court is betwixt ten and fourteene thousand. This warre-like Order of soldiers is in these our dayes much imbased: for now natural Turks are taken in for Ianizaries, as are also

A for the people of Asia; whereas in former times none were admitted into that Order but the Christians of Europe only: beside that, they marrie wiues also, contrary to their antient custome, which is not now forbidden them. And because of their long lying still at Constantinople (a city abounding with all manner of pleasure) they are become much more effeminate and sloathfull, but withall most insolent, or more truly to say, intollerable. It is commonly reported, the strength of the Turkish Empire to consist in this Order of the Ianizaries: which is not altogether so; for albeit that they be indeed the Turks best footmen, and surest gard of the great Sultans person, yet vndoubtedly the greatest strength of his state and empire resteth nothing so much in them, as in the great multitude of his horsemen, especially his Timariots. Beside these Ianizaries, the Turkish Emperour hath a great number of base footmen, whom the Turks call Asapi, better acquainted with the spade than with the sword, seruing rather to the wearying of their enemies with their multitude, than the vanquishing of them with their valour: with whose dead bodies the Ianizaries vse to fil vp the ditches of townes besieged, or to serue them for ladders to climbe ouer the enemies walls vpon. But as the Romans had both their old Legionarie, and other vntrained souldiers which they called Tirones; of whom the first were the chiefe strength of their wars, and the other but as it were an ayd and supply; euen so the Turke accounteth his Timariot horsemen the strength of his army, and the Acanzij (which is another sort of base and common horsemen) but as an accessorie: and so amongst his footmen he esteemeth of his Ianizaries, as did the Romans of their Prætorian legions, but of his Asapi as of shadowes. The Ianizaries are by none to be commanded, more than by the great Sultan himselfe, and their Aga: as for the Bassa's, they much regard them not, but in their rage oftentimes soule entreat euen the greatest of them. The Asapi, as they are but base and common souldiers, so haue they also their ordinarie captains and commanders, men of no great place or marke. The Turks Asapi in what small regard they are had.

The whole state of the great Empire of the Turks is commanded by the great Sultan, by the graue aduice and counsell of his Vizier Bassa's, which were not wont to be in number aboue foure, so prouiding for the secrecie of his high designes or important resolutions, hardly by a greater multitude to be concealed: howbeit that the Sultans of later times haue had sometimes moe, sometimes fewer, as their pleasure was. These men are of all others in that empire the greatest, and for their high places most honoured: vnto them euen the greatest D princes that haue any thing to do in the Turks court, sue and send their honorable presents. By their aduice the great Sultan taketh his wars in hand, neither without them concludeth he any peace. They giue audience vnto the Embassadours of forreine princes, and from them receiue their dispatch. The greatest honors and preferments (which are many in that so great and large an empire) are all by their meanes to be obtained: which maketh them of all others to be sought vnto. Some one or other of them are still Generals ouer the great armies of the Turks, especially in these their late wars, their three last Emperors neuer themselues going forth into the field (excepting once that Mahomet the third for the maintenance of his credit with his men of warre) came downe into Hungarie, and there wonne the citie of Agria:) which leading of such mighty armies is still with great emulation and ambition of the Vizier E Bassa's amongst themselues sought after, as well for the great profit thereby vnto them arising, as for the honour thereof, which is of all other the greatest. But leauing these great ones, the chiefe counsellors for his state; the whole body of his so large and mighty an Empire (all in the hands of martiall men) is gouerned by other great Bassa's, whom they by a most proud barbarous name cal Beglerbegs, that is to say, Lords of Lords, euery one of them hauing vnder him certaine Begs or Sanzackes, who are lords and rulers also ouer some particular cities and countries, with the Timariots therein; yet all still at the command and becke of their Beglerbeg. In antient time there was wont to be but two of these proud Beglerbegs in all the Turks empire: the one commanding ouer all the prouinces the Turke had in Eu- F rope; & the other ouer all that he had in the lesser Asia, now of the Turks called Natolia. But the Turkish empire greatly augmented in Asia by Selymus the first, and also afterwards much enlarged both in Europe and Asia by Solyman his son, the number of the Beglerbegs were by him encreased, and in some sort also changed: who although that they be all Beglerbegs, and that one of them (especially in the time of peace) in the managing of his soldiers, and affaires of his country is not subiect to any other, but is only a [illegible] and of the great Turke; yet notwithstanding in the time of warre, where the Beglerbeg of Romania is, all are obedient vnto him, as the chiefest of the rest; insomuch that none of them but onely he and the Bassa of Natolia are called by the stately name of Beglerbegs, the others being then only called the Bassa's of such and such places, as of Buda, Aleppo, and such like; although indeed they are in nature Beglerbegs, and so written in their Records. For the more manifesting of which their gouernment, as also that they which come hereafter may by comparing of that which is here written, with the state that then shall be, see how much this great Empire in the meane time encreaseth or diminisheth, I haue thought good here briefely to set downe all the said Beglerbegs, with their Sanzackes and Timariots, and as neere as I could (either by reading, or the credible relation of others well trauelled in those countries) together, and as it were at one shew, set forth the whole strength and power of this so mighty an Empire, as also in what countries and prouinces the same is especially placed.

The Beglerbegs or great Commanders of the Turkes Empire in EVROPE.

The first and chiefest of all the Beglerbegs in the Turkish Empire, is the Beglerbeg of Romania or Grecia, called of the Turks Rum-Ili (as we say the Roman Countrey) the principal residence of whose Beglerbegship is at Sophia, a city of Bulgaria, so appointed for the commodious scituation thereof, for the better command of the rest of the prouinces of Europe; howbeit that he for the most part, or rather altogether abideth at the court: which the other Beglerbegs cannot do, for they are bound not to depart from the gouernment of their Prouinces: in which charge they ordinarily continue but three yeares onely, the great Sultan stil changing and altering them at his pleasure. This Beglerbeg hath vnder his owne ensigne and command forty thousand Timariots alwayes ready at his call, vnder the conduct of these and twenty Sanzackes following; namely the

But theſe late erected honours, namely the Beglerbegſhips of Teflis, Siruan, Temir-Capi, Cars, Tſchilder, Paſſa, and the reſt gained by Amurath from the Perſians and the Georgians although they containe a great territorie, are not of themſelues any of them worthie of their honour, or yet able to maintaine the ſame (Siruan, Reiuan, and Tauris onely excepted) but were by the great Baſſa's, Muſtapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Oſman, Amurath his Lieutenants [illegible] greater honour, and the encouraging of them which were to defend [illegible] Confins, erected; being indeed nothing either in power or ſtrength com- L [illegible] antient Beglerbegs either in Europe or Aſia. But hauing thus paſſed through the great kingdomes and prouinces by the Turks holden in Europe and Aſia, with their proud honors therein, let vs go forward toward the South, to ſee what great kingdomes and territories they at this preſent hold in Africke alſo.

The Beglerbegs or great Commanders of the Turkes Empire in AFRICKA.

The Beglerbeg of 1 Miſsir, who ſtill making his abode at the great city of Cairo, hath vnder his command all the Kingdome of Aegypt, with ſixteene Sanzackes, and an hundred thouſand Timariots. M 2 Ceſsir, in antient time called Iulia Ceſaria, but now commonly Algiers, where the Beglerbeg ſtill reſiding, commandeth ouer all that Kingdome, wherein are forty thouſand Timariots.

A The Beglerbeg of
3 Tunis, where he ſtill remaining as a Viceroy, commandeth all that great and large kingdome.
4 Tripolis, the ſeat of his Beglerbegſhip, by Sinan Baſſa taken from the Knights of Malta in the yeare 1551.

There are beſide theſe, two other kingdomes in Africke inrolled in the Turkes records as their owne, although they be not as yet by them brought into the forme of Beglerbegſhips, namely the kingdomes of Fez and Moroco, but are as yet holden by them as their tributaries and Vaſſals.

But hauing thus as it were taken view of the greatneſſe and forces of this ſo mighty a monarchs empire by land, and ſo in ſome ſort bounded it out, let vs conſider alſo his power by ſea. With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the gulfes of Perſia and Arabia, moſt of his territories lying vpon the mediterranian and Euxine ſeas, or elſe more inwardly into the heart of Aſia neere to no ſea. Now for theſe ſeas, no prince in the world hath greater or better means to ſet forth his fleets than hath he: for the ouergrowne woods of Epirus & Cilicia, and more than they, thoſe of Nicomedia and Trapezond are ſo great and thicke, and ſo full of tall trees fit for the building of ſhips and gallies of all ſorts, as is almoſt incredible. Neither wanteth he ſtore of ſhipwrights and carpenters for the framing of that ſo great ſtore of timber, large pay drawing euen the Chriſtian skilfull carpenters and workemen into his Arſenals at Conſtantinople, Synope, Callipolis, and others. For proofe whereof it is worth the noting, that Selymus the ſecond in our freſh remembrance, the next yeare after that notable ouerthrow by him receiued at the Echinades (commonly called the battel C of Lepanto) rigged vp a fleet wherewith Vluzales his Admirall was not afraid to face the whole power of the confederate Chriſtian Princes at Cerigo. Neither hath the Turke euer wanted good ſtore of expert ſeamen after the manner of thoſe ſeas; for beſide thoſe hee hath in ſtore at Callipolis and Sinope, out of his gallies which hee hath alwaies in readineſſe at Lesbos, Chios, Rhodus, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and from the pyrats which he continually receiueth into the ports of Tunis, Bugia, Tripolis, and Algiers, he can and doth from them when need is, chuſe captaines, mariners, and rowers ſufficient for the manning and ſtoring of his fleet. What he is able ao do in thoſe ſeas was well ſeene in our time, by thoſe fleets which he had at Malta, Cyprus, the Echinades, and Guletta. He hath beſide of all neceſſary and warlike prouiſion aboundant ſtore, and of great ordnance to furniſh himſelfe withal both by ſea D and land an infinite quantity. Out of Hungary he hath carried away aboue 5000 great pieces, out of Cyprus 500, and few leſſe from Guletta, not to ſpeak what he hath more got from the Chriſtians in diuers other places alſo. What ſtore he hath of ſhot and pouder hee ſhewed at Malta, where hee diſcharged aboue 60000 great ſhot; at Famagusta, where hee beſtowed 118000; and at Guletta, where in the ſpace of 39 dayes he by the fury of his great ordnance ouerthrew the fortifications which the Chriſtians had bin 40 yeares in building. So that to returne againe to our purpoſe, the Great Turke ſo well prouided of men, mony, ſhipping, and great ordnance, and hauing done ſo great matters at ſea as is before rehearſed, is not in reaſon otherwiſe to be accounted of, than as of a moſt mighty and puiſſant prince as well by ſea as land: which to be ſo, the greatneſſe of his Deniz Beglerbeg or great Admiral (commonly called Capitan Baſſa, of whom we haue not yet ſpoken) well declareth. This great man hauing E charge of all the grand Seigniors ſtrength at ſea, is alway one of the Vizier Baſſa's, not bound ſtill to follow the court, as the other Viziers be, but alwaies or for moſt part reſiant at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, ſo to be the neerer vnto his charge. He that now hath this honourable place is called of the Turks Cigala Baſſa, deſcended of an honorable family of that name in Genoa: who commonly reſiding at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, hath vnder him fourteen Sanzacks, all of them great commanders and men of great place: namely the

for the neereneſſe of the King of Spaine, enemie vnto them both. Now then there remaineth the reſt of the Chriſtian princes bordering vpon the Turke; and firſt the king of Polonia. What theſe two Princes can do the one againſt the other, hath beene ſeene in ſome former expeditions, wherein the Polonian had ſtill the worſe: yet it ſhould ſeeme, that of later time the Turke hath not bin greatly deſirous to moue the Polonian too farre, for that being prouoked by diuers occaſions, (namely in the reigne of Henry the third, in the wars that Iohn the Vayuod of Valachia had with the Turks, many Polonian horſemen ſerued the ſaid Vayuod, though not indeed ſent from the King: and in the time of Sigiſmund the Polonian Coſſackes haue with diuers incurſions not a little troubled them: beſide the late motions of Iohn Zamoſchie the great Chancellour and Generall of the Polonian forces, for the ſtaying of the Tartars by the Turks ſent for) he hath been content to comport the ſame, and not with his wonted pride ſought to be thereof reuenged, as he hath for far leſſe vpon ſome other princes. And on the other ſide, the Polonians ſince the vnfortunate expedition of King Ladiſlaus, neuer tooke vpon them any warres againſt the Turkes, neither gaue ſuch aid as they ſhould vnto the Valachians their confederates, but ſuffered to be taken from themſelues whatſoeuer they had toward the Euxine or Blacke ſea: a thing imputed rather vnto the want of courage in their Kings, than in the Nobilitie of that Kingdome. Sigiſmund the firſt being by Pope Leo X. inuited to the warres againſt the Turks, anſwered them in theſe few words: Set you the Chriſtian princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues, and I for my part will not be wanting. Sigiſmund the ſecond ſo abhorred the wars, that he not onely declined the Turks, but prouoked by the Muſcouites, neuer ſought to reuenge the ſame. King Stephen (by the commendation of Amurath choſen King of Polonia) an indifferent eſteemer both of his enemies Forces and his owne, thought it a moſt dangerous thing to ioyne battell with the Turke, and yet in priuate talke with his friends, would oftentimes ſay, That with thirty thouſand foot ioyned vnto his Polonian horſmen, he durſt well to vndertake an expedition againſt the Turke: which he was ſuppoſed oftentimes to haue thought vpon. The Emperour, with the reſt of the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria, are by a longer tract of ground ioyned vnto this great empire of the Turks, than any one other prince of the world, and beſtow in fortifications and the maintenance of their garriſons, (wherein they haue continually aboue twenty thouſand horſe and foot) the greateſt part of their reuenues euen in the time of peace, much more in theſe their long wars: and with the German forces ioyned vnto their owne, are more carefull how to defend that they haue yet left, than how to recouer that they haue alreadie loſt, or to enlarge their empire. The Emperor Ferdinand with greater force than ſucceſſe vndertooke the vnfortunate expeditions of Bada and Poſſega: which ſo euill fell out, not for that his forces were not ſufficient or ſtrong enough, but for that they wanted agilitie and dexteritie. The truth is, thoſe his armies were ſtrong enough, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, but conſiſted for the moſt part of Germans and Bohemians, ſlow and heauie people, vnfit to encounter with the Turkes, a more ready and nimble kinde of ſouldiers. The Venetians alſo confrontier the Turks by many hundred miles, both by ſea and land, and defend themſelues rather by peaceable policie than force of armes: notably fortifying their ſtrong Holds vpon their frontiers, declining by all meanes the dangers and charges of warre, by Embaſſages and rich preſents, leauing nothing vnattempted (their liberty and ſtate preſerued) rather than to fall to wars. To ſay the truth of them, although they had both coyne and warlike prouiſion ſufficient, yet want they men and victuals anſwerable to ſo great a war againſt ſo puiſſaint an Enemie. There remaineth onely the King of Spaine, of all other the great Princes either Chriſtians or Mahometanes bordering vpon him, the beſt able to deale with him; his yearely reuenues ſo farre exceeding thoſe of the Turks, as that they are alſo probably thought to counterpaile the greateſt part of his Timariots: and his great Dominions in Spaine, Portugall, Naples, Sicilia, Millaine, Sardinia, and the Low-Countries (if they were with him at vnitie) able to affourd vnto him ſo great and powerfull a ſtrength both by ſea and land, as might make him dreadfull euen vnto the Great Turke when hee ſwelleth in his greateſt pride: but conſidering how his Forces are diſtracted for the maintenance of his warres at once in diuers places; as alſo for the neceſſarie defence and keeping of his ſo large and diſperſed territories, not all the beſt of themſelues affected to the Spaniſh gouern-

Which were they not at all to be ſeene, as indeed they be very pregnant, yet the greatneſſe of this Empire being ſuch, as that it laboureth with nothing more than the weightineſſe of it ſelfe, it muſt needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it ſelfe fall, and againe come to nought, no man knowing when or how ſo great a worke ſhould be brought to paſſe, but he in whoſe deepe counſels all theſe great reuolutions of Empires and Kingdomes are from eternitie ſhut vp: who at his pleaſure ſhall in due time by ſuch meanes as he ſeeth beſt, accompliſh the ſame, to the vnſpeakeable comfort of his poore afflicted flocke, in one place or other, ſtill in danger to be by this roaring Lyon deuoured.
